The State came to this conclusion from our "knowledge of his antecedents." It now seems that he not only eagerly accepts the place assigned him on only eagerly accepts the place assigned him on only eagerly accepts the place assigned him on the ticket, but that he was anxious to obtain it. He has signed the pledge of fidelity to the platitude that he can, by double-dealing, worm himself into the Treasurer's office.

We regret, on account of Mr. Hawkins' age and previous character that he should place himself in this position; but if his sense of self-respect is not sufficient to restrain him from leaving himself open to attack, the fault is his not ours. We have no desire to attack him, and would rather avoid any reference to him, individually; but we are not going to permit him, under the shelter of his past good character, to obtain office by the disreputable game he is now playing, without an effort on our part to expose that game.
