THE GREAT FRENCH HENBERY.—With care and good management no branch of domestic industry is more profitable than rearing poultry. Many persons have supposed that what is profitable on a small scale might be made still more so when carried on to a larger extent, but repeated experiments in this and other countries have proved this to be a mistake. The secret of the matter is, that hens cannot thrive and lay without a considerable quantity of animal food. Where but a limited number of fowls are kept about the farm yard the natural supply of insects is sufficient to meet this demand, and hence, when attempts have been made to extend the business beyond this source of supply, they have not prospered. It will be seen from the following interesting account that Mons. Moris de Sora has recently discovered the secret of making hens lay every day in the year, by feeding them on horse flesh. The fact that hens do not lay eggs in winter as well as in summer, is well known, and the simple reason appears to be that they do not get the supply of meat in winter which they obtain in the warm season from worms and insects.
M. de Sora was aware of all facts, and living at the time upon an old dilapidated estate, a few miles from Paris, the acres having been bequeathed to him a few years previously—he set himself seriously at the task of constructing a hennery, which should be productive twelve months in the year. He soon ascertained that a certain quantity of raw meat, given regularly with the addition of rice, produced the desired result, and commencing only with some 300 female fowls, he found they averaged, the first year, some twenty-five dozen eggs, each, in the 365 days. The past season he has more than thus far, about 100,000 hens have been fed on a fair proportion of cake birds, with a close approximation to the same results during the spring, summer and autumn, they have the range of the estate, but always under surveillance. In the winter their apartments are kept at an agreeable temperature and although they have minee meat rations the year round, yet the quantity is much increased during cold weather. They have free access to pure water, gravel and sand, and their combs are always red. To supply this great consumption of meat, M. de Sora has availed himself of the constant supply of superannuated and damaged horses, which can always be gathered from the stables of Paris and the suburbs. These animals are taken to an abattoir owned by M. de Sora himself, and there neatly and scientifically slaughtered. The blood is saved, clean and unmixed with offal. It is sold for purposes of the arts as a commercial article. The skin goes to the tanner—the head, hoofs, shanks, &c., to the glue maker and Prussian blue manufacturer; the larger bones form a cheap substitute for ivory with the button worker, while the remainder of the osseous structure is converted into ivory black, or used in the form of bone dust for agricultural purposes. Even the marrow is preserved: and much of the fashionable and highly perfumed lip salve and pomade, was once inclosed within the leg bones of fat horses. Lees are also found for the entrails—and in fact no portion of the beast is wasted.
The flesh is carefully dissected off the frame of course, and being cut into suitable proportions it is passed through a series of revolving knives, the apparatus being similar to a sausage machine on an immense scale, and is delivered in the shape of a homogeneous mass of minee meat, slightly seasoned, into casks, which are instantly headed up, and conveyed per railroad, to the egg plantation of M. de Sora.
The consumption of horses for this purpose, by M. de Sora, has been at the average rate of twenty-five per week for the last twelve months, and so perfectly economical and extensive are all his arrangements, that he is enabled to make a profit on the costs of the animals by the sale of the extraneous substances enumerated above—thus rendering the cost of the minee meat to him nothing delivered at his hennery.
It has been ascertained that a slight addition of salt and ground black pepper to the mass is beneficial to the fowls, yet M. de Sora does not depend upon these condiments alone to prevent fermentation and putrefaction, but has his store rooms so contrived as to be kept at a temperature just removed from the freezing point through all months of the year, so that the minee meat never becomes sour or offensive, the fowls eat it with avidity, they are ever in good condition and they lay an egg almost daily, in all weathers and in all seasons.
The sheds, offices and other buildings are built around a quadrangle, enclosing about twenty acres; the general feeding ground This latter is subdivided by fences of open paling, so that only a limited number of fowls are allowed to herd together, and these are arranged in the different compartments according to age, no bird being allowed to exceed the duration of four years of life. At the end of the fourth year they are placed in the fattening coops for about three weeks, fed entirely on crushed grain, and sent alive to Paris.
As an item alone in this immense business it may be mentioned that in the months of September, October and November last M de Sora sent nearly one thousand dozens of capons to the metropolis.
He never allows a hen to set!
The breeding rooms are warmed by steam, and the hands kept up with remarkable uniformity to that involved by the female fowl during the process of incubation, which is known to mark higher on the thermometer than at any other period. A series of shelves one above the other, forms the nests, while blankets are spread over the eggs to exclude any accidental light. The hatched chicks are removed to the nursery each morning, and fresh eggs laid in to supply the place of empty shells. A constant succession of chickens are thus insured, and moreover the feathers are always free from vermin. Indeed a lousy fowl is unknown upon the premises.
M. de Sora permits the males and females to mingle freely at all seasons, and after a fair trial of all the various breeds, has cleared his establishment of every shanghai, cochin china, or other outlandish fowl, breeding only from old fashioned barn-yard chanticleers, and the feminines of the same species. He contends that the extra size of body and eggs pertaining to those foreign breeds can only be produced and sustained by extra food, while for capon raising the flesh is neither so delicate or juicy as that of the native bird.
The manure produced in this French establishment is no small item, and since it forms the very best fertilizer for many descriptions of plants, it is eagerly sought for at high prices by the market gardners in the vicinity. The proprietor estimates the yield this year at about 100 cords. He employs nearly 100 persons in different departments, three-fourths of whom, however, are females. The sale of eggs during the past winter have averaged about 40,000 dozens per week, at the rate of six dozens for four francs, bringing the actual sales up to $5,000 in round numbers, for every seven days, or $260,000 per annum. The expenses of M. de Sora's hennery, including wages, interest, and a fair margin for repairs, &c., are in the neighborhood of $76,000, leaving a balance in his favor of $185,000 per year, almost as remunerative as Col. Fremont,s Mariposa grant.—Selected.

THE CASE OF THE CAGLIARI.—Advices from Europe frequently contain references to the case of the Cagliari, and to the difficulty between England and Naples growing out of it. The history of the affair is this: Nearly a year ago, a band of Neapolitan revolutionists, who had taken passage, unsuspected, on board the Cagliari, a Sardinian mail steamer plying between Genoa and the island of Sardinia, overpowered the officers and took possession of the vessel. Having done this, they landed on the coast of Naples, and liberated several hundred political prisoners. They then returned the steamer to the commander. The latter started for Naples to report to the Neapolitan authorities; but, while on his way, the vessel, with the Sardinian flag hoisted, was captured by two Neapolitan war steamers, and borne into port, where she was condemned as a prize, and the crew held as prisoners, under such rigorous confinement that one of them an Englishman, became insane. The Sardinian Government protest against the seizure of the vessel upon the high seas, and the English are indignant at the harsh treatment of two of their countrymen. It is said that one of them has been tried and acquitted at Naples, and the other would be acquitted also.

THE GREAT REAPING MACHINE CASE.—The U. S. Supreme Court yesterday decided the suit between the rival inventors, McCormick and Manny, in favor of Manny on every point.—The Star says:
The case involved several important principles and no large amount of money. It was elaborately argued in five days, with an unprecedented array of working models and illustrations, showing the operation of various reaping machines in the grain field. The decision is a very important one, as it effects all the manufacturers and users of reaping machines throughout the country. The case was originally tried in the Circuit Court of Illinois, and decided by Judges McLean and Drummond in favor of Manny. Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the Supreme Court, affirming the former decision and dismissing McCormick's bill with costs.
