THE THREE WOMEN OF CREVECOEUR.—It is pleasant to record among the evidences of a growing taste for art in our city, the fact that this picture by WITTKAMP has lately been added to the excellent collection by C. H. Wolfle, Esq. The reputation of the artist is familiar to all versed in art, and those who have visited the Philadelphia Academy will readily recall the powerful impression made by his "Siege of Leyden." The Three Women of Crevecoeur" is a subject well calculated to elicit the qualities which pre-eminently distinguish WITTKAMP, as it is in depicting the horrors of war, he chiefly excels. This is evident from the comparatively little interest excited by the Academy's recent purchase of "Dutheen Preaching in the Wilderness."

The incident that suggested the picture under notice is thus related: "In 1854 the Belgian Castle of Crevecoeur, near Bourignes, was besieged, while it contained, among others, three distinguished women, who, long after the soldiers had all fallen, nobly defended the Castle, and surrounded it with dead men: and when the cannons had beaten down the walls and the postern was already open, they ascended to the top of the tower dressed in white: and while the fierce brutal Freuchmen were at their feet and about to enter them, they threw themselves into the Meuse.

The instant selected in the representation is when the women, just within reach of their purgers, are about to take the daring leap. The principal figure, standing on the highest pinnacle of the tower, gives partial support to the other two, and as she is about to sway to her final fall casts a glance of defiance and triumph at the enemy. Her companion on the right assumes the attitude of prayer, and commends herself to Heaven, ere she "plucks resolve." The last, detached from all the earth but the master spirit, to whom she clings with a hold, the feebleness of which is indicated by the relaxed condition of her muscles, has swooned, impending o'er the stream below. The three women occupy nearly the entire canvass, but a small portion of the tower being shown, and the figures and features merely indicated

So powerfully dramatic is the conception, and so warmly are the sympathies enlisted by such an unwonted display of heroism, that one is momentarily disarmed of an inclination to technical criticism. Yet there are salient points which finally solicit judgment. The most palpable of these is the license taken with the time perspective. Two points of sight are selected, one at the bottom of the picture, and the other on a line with the female heads. There is no doubt that this destroys technical unity, but the illustration of a great idea frequently serves in defence of the violation of rules. Reynold's axiom is trite, and Ruskin holds that "true criticism can never consist in the mere application of rules." We should enter into the sympathies of the artist, and then if the unity of his thought does not overshadow all mechanical incongruities, we may conclude his liberties are unjustifiable.

Raphael sports with perspective and chiaroscure, in the "Transfiguration," and although the division in action and character renders it difficult to conceive the whole as one picture, the instance is a notable one, where an artist of transcendent genius dared to risk his private judgment against the world's. Ruskin consumes a large space in defending Turner against his almost habitual disregard of mechanical truth in the relation of his conceptions. "The Old Temeraire" is as clearly dual as "The Three Women of Crevecoeur." Precedent surely justifies Wittkamp, if the necessity of faithful narration did not require the sacrifice he has made. But it was necessary, besides telling the story of heroism, to indicate that heroism by expression as well as action, and this could not be so well done in consciousness half lost to the spectator. It were better, perhaps, to have transgressed only in the accessories, but we choose rather to rely upon our impressions for the translation of Wittkamp's language, than pause to consider if we have been deceived.

The color is German, opaque and imposted, but subdued so as not to divert the eye.

The emotions excited by the picture are rather unpleasant. Admiration is roused for the courage displayed by the heroines, but their impending fall from the dizzy height, sickens by the painful reality with which it is indicated; and the tragedy saddens the more because its objects have stimulated your love for their noble qualities.

To Mr. Wolfle's already valuable gallery, he designs adding two Bas Relief's by BARTHOLOMEW, the sculptor, "Hagar and Ishmael" and "Rebecca led by the Slave," and a Landscape with Cattle, by HART and JAY. Works like these, calculated to elevate the standard of taste, should meet with a warm welcome by genuine lovers of art.

THERE are four great railroads leading from Atlantic cities to the West, which are regarded as rivals and competitors for the carrying trade. These are the New York Central, 666 miles long; the New York and Erie, 446 miles long; the Pennsylvania, 345 miles long, and the Baltimore and Ohio, 380 miles long. The monthly receipts of the first named are not regularly published, of late, so that we are unable to state what its receipts have been. But we have prepared the following statement in regard to the other three roads, showing their receipts during the month of April, as well as since the 1st of January, 1858:

	April.	Jan. 1 to May 1
N. York and Erie Railroad	$545,033	$1,710,211
Baltimore and Ohio "	455,596	1,527,752
Penn. "	403,164	1,737,449

The Pennsylvania Railroad cost, even when allowing a considerable sum for the purchase of the Columbia Railroad, much less than the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, and not much more than one half that the New York
