The rivers in South East Missouri, away from The rivers in South East Missouri, away from the Mississippi bottoms, are especially attractive. Undisturbed by such avalanches of ice as are accustomed to cut and score the banks and root up or crush down vegetation from the borders of our Northern streams, they possess, in the overhanging branches and dipping shrubbery, a peculiar beauty. Joshaw T WALNUT HALL RESTAURANT, bed of manyicolored pebbles, or angular whitish gravel, the admiration for them is unbounded. One is compelled to believe that a country with such streams and mountains cannot be unhealthy. Approps of health—we rede four miles one day to see a family. A sprightly old lady of 78 sat knitting heaide her husband, whose mother, said to be 160, was seated near them, picking cotton. Heg grand children, with their children and grand children, reside on adjoining farms. The appearance of the two old laddes, with their quaint neckerchiefs and ruffled mob-caps of snowy whiteness, at once sent my ideas cruising into the middle of the last century. The centenarian is a little, thin, dried-up Frenchy body, who, if her years were judged by outward appearances, as antiquarians guess at the age of a mummy, might be set down for at least a thousand. Sho remembers well the time when, nearly a hundred years ago, her Huguenot parents forgotten the more recent incident of her life when, fifty years back, her family migrated to the spot where they now reside. The old lady has long been blind; yet in the interval between short periods of apathy into which she sinks from time to time, her busy fingers ply the task they learned when she was a girl.
