ness, and after it is over he and his friends should, as we trust they will, feel ashamed of the part they have played in it. Instead of fighting the democratic party on the manly basis presented by John M. Botts, and attacking the administration in its weak points, they turned all their batteries upon the only point at which the enemy was impregnable. The stringle has been, throughout, a mere string about Slavery. These Southern men are always representing the North for agitating the Slavery question; and yet we find that both in Virginia and Kentucky the leading and absorbing question is Slavery. The candidates talk little about anything else, and they have proved themselves, so far, the most persistent agitators the country has yet.

probably, catact eiver guarantees than platforms or confessions of faith at the eleventh hour. Nor can we disapprove of this. The man selected should be one who is inspired with the faith of the party, rather than one who conforms to it from ambition. The courriers of Louis the Fourteenth grew devout as the Monarch and his mistress did. When he died they relapsed into gallantry and galety. The courriers of the Republican party, which is the hoir apparent to power, will fashion their opinions and demeanor according to the standard which it prescribes. With such a character as Mr. Bates it is different. The order of men to which he belongs prefer allence to speech, lest it should be said they courted office. Yet we are not without hope that he will find fit occasion for dispelling all missprehension as to his real views on the alavery question. Though he has shrunk from public duties of a leading private citizen, and events which will probably transpire in our own state this cummer, will test his opinions and statesmanship."
