The Unknown to Childhood.

BY JOHN K. HOLMES.

How many a child,
That now inhales the breath of innocence,
And dreams away the rapid, peaceful hours
Under a parent's eye, will come to know,
When, on Life's stage his active foot shall move,
More sorrow than his father ere could tell!
Now in the sunshine and the balmy air—
The music of his nature sweetly plays:
No wayward winds have crost it his gentle mind,
While nights and days with bless'd joys return,
And love makes him rest, for bidden.
When manhood comes how little may be left
Of all that once was beautiful in him!
Then—the dark passion that betrays unknown—
The base born dream, as yet, how far away—
The jealousy—the love—ambition—strife—
The jarring elements that make man pale,
Crowding the chambers of the doubting soul;—
Regret and thrash, revenge and agony—
The midnight tear o'er dark, shadowy hours
That come like wintry storms in joyous June,
May be the ministers of scenes as thick fruit
So gentle now, so amicably fair.
So lovely in its playfull loveliness.
But oh, then little light, that sparkles out
Who then will be thy ever constant friend!
Thy father will be gone, thy mother dead,
Their places now will know them then no more,
The lights that yet a welcome make for thee
Will flash no longer in the gentle heart.
The funeral bell will have a meaning then
Unknown to thee, thou little innocent!
By friendship's form another shall be hid;
Behind presence then will see treachery,
And every shifting scene have much to show
Of mean and exultant, of false and fair.
Yet, through it all, if thou will trust in One,
The darkness will grow light before thine eyes.
The dead leaves on the path will rustle still—
The winds amid ily naked boughs will sing,
And through them—branches stripped of summer bloom
The sun of love will come in mercy down;
And, some dear bird in lingering truthfulness
Will warble when thou thinkest all is lone.

The London Times on the Austrian Genius.

[From the Times of April 22d.]

Good Friday of 1859 will be hereafter the epoch of departure whence veterans, now only youthful conscripts, shall commence the story of the great Austrian war. Just as we look back upon the bloodsplilling contest of principles and passions which divided Europe in the last ten years of the last century; just as we note the particular points of difference which grew and widened and smouldered and flamed till the old world was wrapped in the roaring fires, and the vision of all men was darkened by the smoke—so, as there is too much reason to fear, will the men of the succeeding age scan these acts of state which, winged by a swifter agency than the hosts knew, are passing momentarily before our eyes, and deduce how rapidly arose the great unnecessary war which lasted—what prophet shall dare to say how long? The solemnities of the Holy Week are neglected for the hurrying away of armed men. In the meet others upon an appointed spot for slaughter. The festivities of Easter will probably be checked by the cries of men in conflict, and by the sorrows that wait upon victory as well as upon defeat. In secure and secluded Island we only listen to the echoes of distant preparation that are now passing like the fiery cross through the other countries of Europe. "The French army is in full march to the frontiers of Piedmont." General De la Marmora telegraphs from the banks of the Ticino that the Austrian army has made a significant movement on the strategical line of Ticino, and that an attack at any moment may be apprehended. The Court of Vienna, so late as yesterday, reiterates its declaration that all other proposals must be subordinate to the summons already addressed to Sardinia. The Imperial manifesto which is to accompany the declaration of war against Sardinia has already been prepared. Austria, mistress of the position, is ready by act of State and deed of war to initiate the sanguinary drama upon which the curtain is about to rise.

How completely a few days have changed the positions of the parties to this mighty difference! late as Monday last, when Lord Derby from his place in the House of Lords directed such bitter remonstrance against the Emperor of the French it was believed that it was France who was poising the thunderbolt, and that it was from her only that we had occasion to fear lest the sound should come and the fire should fall.—But now, within the last forty-eight hours, Austria has occupied the eyes of Europe, striding forth as the aggressor and the challenger, occupying the arena marked by tacit consent as the spot of conflict. Austria, whether in prudence, or in ambition, or in obstinacy, has shown herself more ready for the fray than the Power which was the origin of the quarrel. France seems to have been taken by surprise. Whether it was that the Emperor believed that all he desired would be obtained from Austria's fears, or whether he trusted to his own fertility in peaceful assurances and to the agency of the Monitor to delay the conflict to a more convenient season, or whether he has calculated ill, or has been negligently served, it is impossible now to say; but certain it is that Austria has the start, and is straining to overtake her. While Austria is manœuvering on the Ticino, France is still only sending troops to Dauphiny. While Austria is present to follow up her decisive menace by an irresistable attack, France is only collecting her defensive levies at a distance from the position of her jeopardized ally.

Austria is as we have said, at this moment masters of the position. She has an army on the Ticino, before which, if put in motion, the forces of Sardinia must melt away into the fortresses of Alessandria and Genoa, or must be hopelessly scattered. Miracles do happen, undoubtedly, now and then; 40,000 men have beaten 80,000 men; but sane men do not reckon on the repetition of such incidents in the nineteenth century, and between regularly disciplined European troops It would be fanatical to suggest that Sardinia can hold her own for a week against the hosts about to be let loose upon her. The flood of spoilers will sweep over the land. Turin must be occupied, although probably not held. The power of the Piedmontese Monarchy will be shut up in the few fastnesses which Sardinia contains, and the real struggle will not begin until Austria has struck a blow which will be heard throughout Italy. As a belligerent Power she is wise in her generation, but she is not wise in her generation if she is seeking unnecessarily to become a belligerent power. If she believed that there was no hope of permanent peace, that the French Emperor was resolved upon war, and that she was only being kept for losing under the weight of arms, waiting till it should suit the convenience of the Emperor to overwhelm her, if she, moreover, is willing at this moment, when her promptitude must give her the choice of an offensive policy, to make those reasonable retractions which the interests of humanity and the public opinion of Europe require of her—then it will be difficult to say that she is entirely wrong in having sought to participate a crisis in which she was bleeding to death. But if this is a first forward step in an aggressive and a defiant policy—if Austria seeks to enter Sardinia as the armed apostle of absolution and of ultramontane priestcraft; if she has taken up her old world mission of binding the bodies and coercing the minds and consciences of all human beings born in Italy, then the fact of her having been the first to commence this war will be no unimportant item in the great indictment which will be pressed against her, whatever may be her ultimate intentions, she has by her precipitancy done the Emperor of the French this great good: Whereas, three days ago, all Europe looked upon him as an imperial robber, seeking occasion to let loose his prepared armies upon a peace-loving neighbor, the world will see in this sudden start and in the hasty and unready preparations of Napoleon III, some evidence that after all his menaces he had not intended to provoke the combat which Austria has now commenced.

The great question for us to consider, however, is not how Austria stands, or at what pace France hastens, or even how soon Sardinia can be overrun, but what is the position and policy of England. Lord Derby has said that, "if war breaks out, whatever be the consequence, our neutrality, as long as it may last, must to a certain extent be the armed neutrality, enabling us to take our part on that side, whatever it may be, which the honor, the interests and the dignity of the country may indicate as best deserving of our support." These words, coupled with others bearing upon the occupation of the shores of the Atlantic, tended to a scarcely ambiguous intimation that if the events of the impending war should lead French troops into the Lombardo Venetian kingdom, England would appear as a combatant in the melee. We ventured to comment upon these words in a tone of remonstrance. Now that the event appears more probable, and the preceding circumstances almost certain, we think it right to reiterate our protest against engaging England either by alliance, or menace, or guarantee, so as to draw her into this purely Continental quarrel. Surely we are not going to commit over again the faults committed by our fathers, and to burden ourselves with debts and obligations too great for ourselves or our sons to bear in the pursuit of some chimerical notions as to what we should like to see occur among our neighbors. We say, at all risks and at all events, keep England out of this struggle between two dynastic powers. What have we, a free constitutional people, to do with a struggle between two despots, one of whom represents the principles of absolute power and priestly dominion, and the other the despotism delegated by pure democracy? If it must be so, let them fight; no English statesman can suppose by weakening each other they can become more dangerous to us.

STATE OF AFFAIRS IN NORTHERN ITALY.

A correspondent who has just returned from a tour through a great part of the Italian peninsula, and on whom reliance may be placed, sends us the following interesting communication:—"The state of Italy may be thus described: At Venice the troops continue to arrive at the rate of three and four thousand a day. The government contracted with the Lloyd's Company, at a rate of a florin a head, to bring over any number of troops; and, besides, two large government steamers arrive every morning crowded with soldiers. Fortifications have been erected on the Lido commanding the entrances to Venice, and various other works have been constructed on the small islands to the north of the city to prevent any surprise by gun boats, as in the event of war an attack on Venice is considered by the Austrians as a certainty. Four large vessels were hired on the 15th to take artillery stores, ammunition, &c., to Ancona. Contracts were entered into to construct log houses at Mantua for the troops, and no less than 500 masts were contracted for to furnish the arsenal at Venice. The empty palaces at Venice are taken for barracks; even the Raggonica, which belonged to the Infanta of Spain, is now crowded to its highest window with troops, and the houses belonging to the Count de Chambord, in the Place San Vidal, are being altered to accommodate soldiers. From Venice to Milan the whole country is covered with troops, and the greatest activity is visible in Verona, Mantua, and Bessebiera. At Milan, the troops are billeted on the Italians, and the numbers of the Austrian soldiery now in Italy cannot be computed as less than 220,000 men. The Emperor with Baron Heiss, was expected at Venice on the 17th instant. His Majesty's yacht left Venice on Saturday last for Trieste, to convey his Majesty. At Turin continual desertions from the Lombardo-Venetian States arrive, and on Sunday last upwards of 200 young Florentine soldiers had made their way to Turin. The preparations for war on both sides, and the certainty of a revolution should no war occur, place all the efforts of the Congress in a very peculiar point of view, for with the vicinity of the various troops to
