GAS FROM ROSIN OIL. CHEAPER THAN COAL. FATTY FLUID MATERIAL. THE HIGH ILLUMINATING PROPERTIES of Gas from Rosin and oleaginous substances have always made them a favorite material for the manufacture of illuminating Gas. Many Gas Companies use Rosin in with coal, in order to supply their customers with a Superior Quality of Gas. ROSIN OIL is entirely free from all dross and refuse substances, and yields at once, its Brilliant Illuminating Gas. The greater original cost of the apparatus for the manufacture of coal gas together with the attention and expense constantly required, and the difficulty, if not impossibility, of entirely separating the unwholesome, deleterious and offensive gases, generated in coal, render the ROSIN OIL APPARATUS cheaper and more desirable in every way. S. COATES, of 376 Broadway, New York, has devoted his entire attention to the manufacture and sale of Portable Gas Apparatus, and he respectfully calls the attention of the public to his present complete and efficient machine. Perfect satisfaction to the purchaser guaranteed in every case. For further information address S. COATES, 376 Broadway, New York; or DAVID H. WILLIAMS, Pittsburgh, Pa. jy22dly&eT

Intentions of Napoleon.

[From the London Times, June 21]

Napoleon III. has, in his address to the inhabitants of Milan, reiterated all his promises, and he relains to himself the character of the disinterested regenerator of Italy. He declares that he is not one of those men who cannot comprehend the spirit of their age, and that he does not appear in Italy to further his own object of personal ambition, or to aggrandize the territory of France. To do this would be, in the opinion of Napoleon III., not only a wrong but a foolish act, for the time must always come when moral influences are fruitful and victories are sterile. Napoleon III. enters Milan as the liberator of Italy. He comes only to give freedom to the finest part of Europe; he promises the Lombards that if they will be his soldiers to-day they shall to-morrow be the free citizens of a great country. He has sworn to the Italians to combat their enemies, to maintain for them domestic order, and to throw no obstacle in the way of the manifestation of their wishes. To the Germans, who are so unquiet in their homes, and who are living in their places of strength, he puts forth protestations equally explicit, which have the additional guarantee in being indorsed by the Emperor of Russia. Contemporaneously with the publication of the French Emperor's address to the people of Milan, we have the Russian Circular declaring the policy of that Empire during the existence of the Italian war. France gives her Imperial promises to Italy; Russia at once soothes, reassures and threatens Germany. France insists that she was called to this war by her interests and her honor, and that she has no other object but to defend her ally, who was unjustly attacked, and to give liberty to Italy.

Russia declares that Austria has been altogether in the wrong; that her objection to the admission of Sardinia to the Conference was at once unreasonable and unjust; and that in the negotiations which succeeded the French Government has honestly seconded the efforts of those Powers who were sincerely desirous of peace. Russia, therefore, is with France in sentiment, but, as the war itself cannot be averted, she will use all her efforts to localize the evil, and to confine it to the country where events have called it forth. She tells Germany that for her there is no cause of fear, that the Emperor of the French has given assurances, which Russia abundantly believes, that no enterprise is in prospect which will injure the interests or the dignity of the great power of which Prussia is the head and the natural protector. France has a righteous quarrel with Austria, and Russia will stand by and see it fairly fought out. The war shall not spread beyond Italy, and it shall be quenched in Italy. Russia very significantly intimates that if Germany interferes in this matter, so long as it remains only an Italian quarrel, Russia will also interfere, and restore the equilibrium to the contest.

We must take it that these two conspiring heads are sincere in the professions they thus publicly put forward to the world. We must believe that Napoleon when he has driven the Austrians from Italy will hand over Italy to the Italians—will unite Lombardy with Piedmont—and restore the government of the Roman States—will give back to Naples its Constitution, and accord guaranties for its continuance. We must give our confidence to Russia that when she favors this obvious course she also has no hidden object in view; that she also has sympathy with Italy, and, if any other motive mingles with her pity, it is only a not unnatural desire to pour some slight humiliation upon the head of Austria, and to exalt Prussia at the expense of her rival. It is not to be suggested that these State papers should reveal that which is not true. When two great Sovereigns come forward to protest before Europe that their policy is of a conservative and disinterested character, and that if they are fighting battles and conquering kingdoms, it is for the progress of civilization, for the advance of moral influences, and not from selfish motives, we are bound to believe them—not, indeed, to throw ourselves off our guard, but still to believe them. We cannot cease from our astonishment that these things should be so; we cannot even yet quite comprehend how the Emperor Napoleon should wish to build up in Italy a form of government which will be a perpetual menace to him in France—still less can we understand why Russia should seek to give consistency and power and materiel form to those ideas which must always be antagonistic to absolute rule. But it is vain to argue against the probability of a fact, when the fact itself stands bodily in evidence. Here are the declarations voluntarily put forth to Europe, uncalled for by any special scheme of policy, carrying with them no particular benefit to the persons who thereby commit their own honor and the honor of the nations whom they represent to the good faith of the professions which they thus spontaneously make.

THE CAPTURE OF VEDENO.—We find in Le Nord a letter from a Russian officer, giving an account of the capture of Vedeno, the stronghold of Schamyl. The fortress is surrounded by such wild mountain country that the Russian battalions occupied twelve hours in marching the last eight miles. They were not opposed; Schamyl appeared to be waiting to attack them where there would be no retreat. They encamped a mile from Vedeno, 10 battalions with 10 small mountain howitzers. Another column of five battalions brought two mountain howitzers to the summit of the mountain range behind Vedeno, but finding the mountain so declivitous that they could not descend it, were obliged to retrace their steps. The Russians now found themselves 30 miles from their supplies by a terrible road, and before a strong fortress well supplied with artillery. They remained there for half a few days, and no siege guns. There was no attack during the night, but next morning all the heights around their camp were covered with masses of Circassians, who seemed to look upon them as an easy prey.

Fire was opened upon their camp from a battery of two guns. Before them was Vedeno, surrounded by strong intrenchments, and defended by six redoubts, whose ramparts were decorated by a thousand banners of lively colors, while the great black banner, with the silver crescent of Schamyl, floated above all, lit up by a magnificent Winter sun, sparkling in a thousand reflections over the icy snow. A magnificent picture. In an hour a Russian battalion were in possession of the height from which the battery had been playing upon the camp. But nothing could be done for a month, except to secure their communications, to make a practicable road to the open country, and to bring up siege guns. Even then it took four battalions three days to bring up four 12 pounders and to repel the attacks which were made on the working parties. The Russians could see the munitions which were brought into Vedeno, but they could not get at them; they could not attack the place from the upper side.

On the 20th of March they got up some mortars and several batteries of 12 pounders; on the 30th the trenches were opened on three sides, and on the 13th of April the first and largest of the redoubts, Andi, was bombarded. After a bombardment of twelve hours the assault was given, and it was taken in less than half an hour. Schamyl had held out bravely all day, and, in spite of the crushing superiority of the Russian fire, his artillery and riflemen had responded. There was one strange incident in the assault; at the same time, above all its roar, the national hymn of Russia was heard in the redoubt, and half a mile away towards Vedeno, the feeble and lying sounds of the Nebus, the evening prayer, sung by the warriors in the midst of grape and ball. Towards 8 o'clock all became calm, and the Russian troops bivouacked in the redoubt they had taken; but at midnight they were startled at seeing the great house of Schamyl in flames, kindled by the faithful, who would not have it profaned by the hands of unbelievers.

At dawn there was no sign of the enemy in Vedeno; they had fled. The Russians were astonished at the misery, poverty, and filth revealed by the condition of the houses. They must have been very filthy. Corpses were lying everywhere. Pools of blood, human limbs, earth recently moved sinking beneath the tread, and exposing human feet and arms, broken weapons, bloody and torn garments, houses in ruins, made up a picture of misery and desolation. The works of defence were immense; what was lacking in art was made up in mass. To judge by the bodies lying about, and the fact that the Circassians rarely abandon their dead, they must have suffered very severely. The system of defence of the place was so bad that no portion of it was tenable after this redoubt, Andi, had been taken. Several battalions were occupied for three days in razing the fortress and destroying the town, and a fortress was built which is to be the headquarters of the infantry regiment of Kourinsk. All Chechnia was taken with Vedeno; thousands of its inhabitants have given in their adhesion to Russian Government, and they are still coming in. The religious superstition which was Schamyls' chief strength with the people appears to have been broken by the capture of his stronghold, which was
