The Cause of Italy Now in the Hands of the Italians—Garibaldi as a Leader.

It would appear that the unanimity of the Italian people is not satisfactory to the Liberator of Italy. In the midst of their enthusiasm, Parma, Modena and Florence are under the resentiment of some heavy misfortune. The sun that first warmed them into action is retired behind a very dark cloud. There is a certain chilling severity about the countenance of the Liberator, He is not a man who likes to be trifled with. People ought to understand other people better There is a certain delicacy of expression and phraseology of high disinteresfedness which is never intended to be taken quite literally. The barrister and the physician enter into the minute circumstances of the client's or the patient's case, and tax all their energies to gain his cause, or to kill his disease. It is all done from the purest motives. It would be unworthy of these liberal professions to suggest the idea of any sordid recompense. Yet everybody knows that there is a certain something which, although veiled in the obscurity of that learned word, "honorarium," has a metallic sound and a yellow complexion; and everybody is well taught that if the ceremony of the honorarium be delayed or intermitted, the careful attendance and the consoling sympathy will not long endure. These Italian Duchies do not seem to know the rules of good breeding in such matters. In spite of due warning given them from all parts of Europe, they actually believe, or are proceeding as though they believed, that it was entirely for their beaux yeux that the Emperor of the French undertook to spend some £20,000,000 and twenty or thirty thousand French lives. The service has been done: Austria has been made to decamp, the Grand Dukes are in exile, and the powerful ally has gone back like a gentleman to his own country again, leaving only some 60,000 men mercenaires to occupy Lombardy. So far as the Duchies are concerned nothing could possibly be better than his whole behavior. But now comes the turn of the Duchies. The Liberator stands silent with his hands behind his back. What makes him so silent and reserved? Why does he so evidently expect something to happen behind his back? Gentlemen of Tuscany, you have forgotten the usual thing—you have omitted the ceremony of the honorarium. Montanelli and Parma reminded you of the necessity in vain. That silent figure is a wronged man. Even so rough, frank, candid English, do not, when a gentleman tells us that he is our "most obedient, humble servant," take him at his word and send him our boots to black. Yet Italians, so delicate in finesse and so fine in policy, have not surely been guilty of the cheat of pretending to take words of ceremonial for words of meaning.

It is pretty clearly the opinion of Prince Pantaleoni that his master has been "done," and he by no means disguises that opinion to the Tuscans. Everything has been so studiously left open for the Tuscans to do what was proper The Sardinian royal effects were withdrawn, trustworthy Freemasons were not absent, the freedom of election was guarded vigilantly; but unaccountably the electors would not elect The Tuscans by their awkwardness have left the Emperor only a choice between a ridicule and a crime He must either accept his position, or use or permit coercion The Tuscans, however, complain that there has been no awkwardness on their side, that in full innocence of heart they believed they were to be free, and have used their freedom with a well moderate exultation They do not see why they should have changed the rule of a stranger whom they did not like for that of a stranger whom they hate When one of the old buccaniers was rescued by some Caribs from the hands of his white brethren who were going to hang him, he rejoiced, until he found that his deliverers had rescued him and were fattening him only that they might eat him Tuscany protests that she desires neither to be hanged nor to be eaten, and all parties think her, in this, perverse and unreasonable Austria concentrates her forces at Mantua, Sardinia receives orders to withdraw from all active assistance, and the Emperor Napoleon is asserted to have declared that he cannot prevent the armed interference of Austria to carry out the terms of the treaty of Villafranca. These rumors—which must be no more than rumors, which cannot have any foundation in reality—have spread black consternation over the faces of the Tuscans So much the the worse for the Tuscans All Europe has admired them for what they have not done, and for what they have said. It remains, however, to be seen what they will do. It unhappily seldom happens that prudence and moderation alone are sufficient to raise a nation of dependents into a nation of freemen. To be free a nation must fight, or, at least, must show itself ready to fight. "Blank consternation" will do no more than blank cartridge. The Tuscans and the Modenese and the Parmesans must do what all nations have done who are now free and independent—they must make manifest that they are ready to do that thing which it has ever been so hard for Italians to manage—that is to say, to fight for themselves. They must not lie down and wail, and hope for Germans and English to come and fight for them. They must not hope to hire a new Sir John Hawkwood. They must not hope for a political knight-errantry which never did exist, nor in the mercenary aid of Free Lances, by which their country has in all ages been torn and weakened and enslaved. If Tuscany is not ready to fight for her freedom, if her citizens are still as soft and feminine as when they used to hire foreign ruffians to fight out their civil broils, or to settle their quarrels with Venice or Milan, she had better yield at once, and say no more about it. Slavery, or at any rate political submission, is her natural and proper condition. When a people renounces the dangers of freedom it abjures the freedom to be slain. This is the language that has always been held to Florence, but generally held in vain. For five centuries since Petrarch prophesied the resurrection of Italy by means of Italian valor.

"Virtù contr'al furore
Prenderà l'arme e sia il combattere corto
Che l'antico valore
Negl'Italici cuor non è ancor morto."

But the valor has not yet been found to verify the prediction. It is nearly four centuries since their great countryman Machiavelli, showed the Florentines that all the misfortunes of Italy arose from the national habit of fighting by proxy. Every one must remember the brilliant description by Lord Macaulay of the over-refined Italian, who was far too civilized to do such vulgar work himself, and who hired barbarians to do it for him. Are the Tuscans of today only what the Tuscans of a thousand years before have been? Then, all our admiration for their calm attitude and excellent behavior will vanish. People who do not intend to fight had better be calm. But we hope for better things. We have seen the Sardinians fight well, and even the Romans against hopeless odds fought out a hopeless fight. Have the Tuscans also unlearned their habits of effeminacy, and has their love of freedom so strung their nerves that they can look upon Austrian bayonets without blenching? It may be that this trial is yet in store for them. It is quite certain that if they show themselves ready to submit rather than to make a desperate resistance against odds, they will be quietly extinguished.

Whatever may be the policy of the two Emperors, Tuscany and her associated insurgent States can never have a better opportunity for Italian unity than now offers. In Garibaldi, they have a man who has given innumerable proofs of his patriotism and devotion—a man of the true Washington stamp—such as is reproduced only at rare intervals and for great results. If with the unexampled advantages they now possess they cannot hold their own against Austria, even should Austria be allowed to make the attack, they can never hope, upon any occasion, to defend themselves. They are by a man who has not been accustomed to count chances too closely when great issues are at stake, and if it be possible for a Tuscan population to fight for liberty this leader will do so. The Real Heroes.

The Paris Constitutionnel has greatly astonished the public by its praise of Garibaldi and Kossuth. It says:

"There are two men whose fortunes during twelve years have known the widest extremes. For a time partisan feeling followed them and overwhelmed them with homage; for a time it made
