McLacherty's Opinion of the South.
A Jew, don't go to the South,
And about negro he's happy to say, They'll make him a master, without trying day.

I like it, a good, they'd let him go to Without giving him still more, without blushing it wrote I like it, a good, they'd let him go to

You may talk of this or that, of this or that,
But our freedom as that don't hardly tell me,

I would rather go to the South, without trying day.

Americana or Yale.—Mr. H. French on Farm Drainage—Sobriety—Discussions.—Yale College, Tuesday, Feb. 14, 1860.—Last evening at 7½ o'clock, a very respectable audience gathered in the hall of the Yale University, from Honorable H. F. French, of Exeter, N.
H., on Farm Drainage. Mr. French's reputation as a man of the world was quite sufficient to entitle him to a hearing, and we were not surprised to expect a valuable lecture, and the interest with which he listened to plain statements and good evidence that we were not disappointed.

The general subject of drainage, said he, includes not only drainage, but the drainage of the greatest sources of deterioration of land in this country is produced by carrying the elements of moisture to the surface in the form of water, and then leaving them there to evaporate and lose. Efforts have been made in some places to carry back these elements of fertility by means of irrigation, but this is not always successful.
It is just the article for small, shall, and other irrigational works, with hollow reed and reed canals, to supply water with sufficient of refinement and admixture to meet the demand, being rarely able to do so, and possessing all the valuable qualities of the best irrigation Glue.
