

These performers consisted of seven Ben-Schidim Arabs from Aland, a new line of hundred and three Negroes to the east of them. Six of them were playing upon the piano, and three upon the organ. They were accompanied by a band of brass instruments, and a chorus of ten, who sang with alacrity.

Having made their arrangements as if holding a concert, they began to play. The organist, who was seated at the right, struck the first chord, and the piano accompaniment followed. The chorus then sang a song in Arabic, and the organist and pianist played a piece of music. The organist then struck a chord, and the piano accompaniment followed. The chorus then sang a song in Arabic, and the organist and pianist played a piece of music.

Replacing the organ on the ground, the organist struck a chord, and the piano accompaniment followed. The chorus then sang a song in Arabic, and the organist and pianist played a piece of music. The organist then struck a chord, and the piano accompaniment followed. The chorus then sang a song in Arabic, and the organist and pianist played a piece of music.

As it was evident that the organ was not intended for the people, I asked him to let me handle it. He then struck a chord, and the piano accompaniment followed. The chorus then sang a song in Arabic, and the organist and pianist played a piece of music.

It is a fact that I speak from ocular experience, but although I have investigated the matter, I have not seen the organ. I have, however, seen the subject. I have applied to the organist, and he has told me that the organ was not intended for the people, but for the amusement of the organist and pianist.
