Judge Kelly, in his speech traday, brought out the most authoritative quotation from the Constitutional authorities, yet made in opposition to the President's theory, that the States themselves have exclusive control over the subject of suffrage. In the debates on Constitution, section eight, Debates, third voi mue, page three hundred and sixty-secen Madison said in reply to a question by Monroe: "Should the people of any state be any means be deprived of the right of or suffrage, it was judged proper that it should be remedied by the General Government. It was found impossible to fix the time ment. It was found impossible to fix the time place and manner of the election of Represen tatives in the Constitution. It was found no easury to leave the regulation of these in the cessary to leave the regulation of these in the first place to the State Governments as being best acquainted with the situation of the people, subject to the control of the General Government, in order to enable it to produce uniformity, and prevent its own dissolution, and considering the State Govern-ments and General Governments as distinct bosties, acting in different and independent expactities for the people. It was thought the particular regulation should be submitted to expandities for the people. It was thought the particular regulation should be submitted to the former, and the general regulations to the inter. Were they under exclusive control of the state Government, the General Government might easily be dissolved; but if they be regulated properly by the State Legislatures, the Congrussional control will very probably never be exercised. The power-appears to me satisfactory and as unlikely to be abused as any part of the Constitution."
