But President JOHNSON seeks to prot his invasion of the rights of Congress by the shelter of the great name of Presiden LINCOLN. He claims that he has simply been following in the footsteps of his predecessor. This is true of the general features of his plan, but not of the spirit with which it is pressed. Mr. Lincoln made a speech from the historic window of the White House, April 11, 1865, in which, speaking

This is not the only plan that might cossibly be acceptable; and I also distinct This is a totally different position from that now taken by President Johnson. But, passing this, the appeal of the President dent, instead of excusing him, only makes his case still worse. Mr. Lincoln devised and put his policy in operation without consulting the thirty-eighth Congress. After he had manufactured State Communications and secured the election of delegations to Congress, he submitted his policy to the Houses, and it was rejected. He tried his recovery and it was rejected the theorems experiment at both sessions of that Congress, and with the same result. When President Johnson borrowed that policy, he knew it had been condemned by the egislative department of the Government He knew, moreover, that the action in this particular of the thirty-eighth Congress, at its first session, had gone to the people for re-view, in the election of the thirty-ninth Congress.
