It is hard enough to be poor in the country, where social position is not so sherply defined, where wants are few; where all live plainly; and where artificial wants do not press and clamor gratification. But in towns unreal wants are created and become more imperious in their demands than natural ones. To be hungry and ragged and dirry, in the midst of luxury and wantonness and retirement, is a lot sad beyond the power of expression; and the mystery is not that this adverse fortune wrecks many, but that any are found who escape destruction.
