His impassive countenance does not serve as a window through which his soul may be seen, but as a mask behind which his motives and intentions are concealed. Napoleon I adopted as one of his fundamental maxims the sentence that "Lying is a power." The terror inspired by his name enabled him oftimes to make a lie stand in place of a regiment, a batalion, a brigade, a division, or a corpa. In looking over his letters to his brother Joseph, now published, it is shooluely suckaning to see with what carnesiness he enjoined deplicity and falsehood, as a most advantageous policy, upon one whose instincts revolted at the 'degradahas not established a reputation for 'esponse''

The illustrious mapbew has no scruples of delicacy or conscience in raying whatever seems to be for his immediate interests. Unfortunately for himself, he has carried the habit of unveracity so far, and been exposed in it so often, that he stands altogether discredited.

A story is told of Bismank. He was interrogated by the Austrian Ambassador touching his purposes in a certain matter. It suited his convenience to nake a direct naswer, which he did; but he gruffly added, "If the fact had been otherwise, I should have made the same otherwise, I should have made the same otherwise, I should have made the same of the rebellion have ocea since a surprise of the rebellion have ocea of the did to the surprise of the rebellion have ocea of the red to same a surprise of the rebellion have ocea of the did to same of the rebellion have ocea of the rebellion have ocea of the red to same of the rebellion have ocea of the red to same of the respective of the rebellion have ocea of the red to same of the respective of the rebellion have ocea of the red to same of the respective of the rebellion have ocea of the red to same of the respective of the red to same of the re
