GENERAL GRANT'S POSITION DEFINED. So long as General GRANT was con eral of the Army, and his friends were also content, it was proper for him to withhold his opinions on current politi-cal questions, until some expression be-known as the arema of politica. No man has a right to enter there, soliciting either personally or through friends, the suffrages of the people, without declaring what political principles he espouses; and the people would be derilect of duty should they fail to challenge any man who asked political elevation while concealing the principles on which he will administer whatever civil trust might be committed to him. That Grant is a candidate for President is too palpable to admit of dispute. Nothing short of his own positive refusal to stand can take him out of that category. Whether it is best for him to vacate the high and permanent position he dils, and in which he has won a renown that shall live throughout all coming ages, to accept a place only one grade higher, for the space of four years, is a problem which others have no right to decide.

By far the larger part of the Republicians have been immovably fixed in the resolution to accept no man as their Presidential candidate until they had

Fourth, resolution to accept no man as their | Presidential candidate until they had full proof that he was in general accord with them on the questions involved in the work of reconstructing the Union. There have been various and contradictory reports relative to the views of General GRART. The Democrate, the Conservatives and the Radicale claimed him and with equal positiveness. This was indicative, not necessarily of duplicity on his part, but of the greediness of leaders of parties or of faction to appropriate the instre of a great name to their special uses. It was ungestive, full proof that he was in general acco moreover, of reticence on the part of the General under circumstances calculated ure of fanatical influences, and the amto mislead the public or a considerable

THE PREDIDENCE PROGRAMIE
When the Reconstruction bill was passed the President comprehended the letter and spirit of it perfectly. In his veto message, transmitted to the House of Representatives, he developed min utaly his understanding of the bill, and concurred fully in the interpretation given to, it on both sides of the chambers After the bill had passed in the fully and those who simply pronounced in law over his objections, it was seriously questioned at Washington and through out the country whether he would carry into effect a statute with which he had founds on much full. In the columns of the Matenal Intelligencer, his accredited organ, and in numerous conversations, he promptly arowed that his digretions ary power was expended, and that nothing remained for him to do dout to execute the law as he found it.
