Haif of the original Thirteen, a third or fourth of them, organized on the eternal principles of equal justice, must soon have overshadowed and absorbed all others on a slavery foundation, and would have been stronger to day than the Union they made on a compromise. Will we profit by the lesson itsught by their mistake, or rebuild on this hest of young compromises which even now shakes the earth with the premoitions of coming revolution? Let the people arise in their might, secure the consummation for which our martyrs have died, strangle the monsters which now clamor for life but would soon demand dominion and bring desolation; and lay the foundations of our reconstructed government, broad and deep, with no disturbing, no explosive force, beneath its corner-stone; but resting on a basis firmer than the evering on a basis firmer than the evering on a basis firmer than the evering the second that our land have the floods shall break against it.

It is in vain that our land has been resting on a basis firzer than the everisating hills, and able to stand when the floods shall break against it.

It is in vain that out land has been clothed in mourning and drenched in blood, in vain that cities have been battered down; navies sunk; fruitful fields trampled as highways, and posterity loaded with debt, if we are but to repeat the old experiment of serving God and Mammon; untitus light and darkness; marrying Liberty and Slavery; yoking the sheory of Equal Rights for all, to the prastice of No Rights to some; and having the paradox of a Christian civilization put to shame by Mahomedan barbarism. If the spirit of slavery, and those men; who from infancy have only breathed its spirit, are to have lot or part in restoring the Government they have labored to destroy, those patriots who died that their country might live, will surely rise in a terrible judgment segainst.
