A crime of serious magnitude is committed in a country. It becomes inevitable with the committed in a country. The description is made dependent upon a modification of the control of the country of calcular. The arise has been defined as the control of the country of the bly a matter of notoriety. Inevitably all men accustomed to weight and decide problems of any sort, come to such conclusions as the evidence adduced seems to warrant. The floating evidence may recede or accumulate from day to sky. Corresponding changes are wrought in the opinions of men to whom knowledge comes. When the case comes on for trial, the minds of judges, jurors and spectators are awayed to and fro as the train of evidence is presented, until the whole that is known is brought out, and then a decision is reached, if the evidence is sufficient for that purpose; otherwise the case is determined by the doubts that perplex it.
