The Pittsburgh Gazette

A DIRGE.
ANONYMOUS.

Let the clothes my limbs with sackcloth and strew ashes o'er my head,
Let me close the doors of mourning, lest this wretched thing be said:
Lo! the hearth is cold and naked, and its light forever fled!

Let me dig thy grave, unwitnessed, in the lingering winter snow,
And conceal thee as a treasure: so that none alive may know
But the world has lost, or whither its supremest creatures go.

I could never think thee mortal: when I looked into thine eyes,
I beheld a wondrous vision through the gates of Paradise,
All the light, the life ecstatic, of the fairest inner skies.

Nay, thou art not dead as others: thou hast only lent thy worth
To make beautiful and vital what was once but senseless earth,
And thou'lt give its dust a spirit, an immortal second birth.

For since earth contains thy beauty, she has grown a holier thing;
She will waken fairer, sweeter, in the coming days of spring,
When the early blossoms open and the wandering songs take wing.

We shall see within the violet thy glittering life incline;
In the lily-of-the-valley shall thy purity recline;
And yet later thou shalt triumph in the splendor of the rose:

So that most will say thy footsteps must have been among the flowers,
And will fail to miss thee wholly, through thy gift to Nature's power,
In the long soft summer mornings and the tranquil evening hours.

Only I shall have the secret, and the fatal truth shall know.
By this grave I dig to hide thee in the tardy winter snow—
By this vacant desolation—by this utter, endless woe.
