-Anthony Trollope is coming to America. The genial creator of that charming bevy of English people whom we have all long since learned to love and sympathise with, is actually once more to be among us. With him will come the eminent Arch Deacon of Plumstead Rectory, the charming Lilly Dale, Lady Alice Vavasour, and all those pleasant people, whose farewell last year made us all so sad. Trollope is a man to whom Americans may, without toady ism, show any amount of kindness; he has City are said to make their living by selling he has written novels which, in truthfulness written a book about us that is not ill natured; to life and human nature, are second only to ing greatly for want of sufficient food, or by the North during the war. We sincerethose of Thackeray, and he stood bravely Geo. Noble, brother of General Noble, as hearty an American welcome as he merly hope that this gentleman will meet with

China and Japan.

Our people cannot too steadily keep in mind the new era which is to be opened by the Pacific Railroad, or railroads, in bringing this country into close relations with the two great countries of the East, China and Japan.

London is now confessedly the centre of the commercial world, and in virtue of this fact, partly natural and partly acquired, draws to itself more routes of trade and travel than any other two or three cities. Let us see, then, how London stands with regard to the main routes to China and Japan, which will be presented to its choice when the Pacific Railroad is opened from New York to San Francisco. The distance from London to Yokohama, in Japan, is

...... 2,980 miles, or 34 days Difference In like manner the distance from London to Shanghai, in China, is by Suez 10,379, New York 8,355, making a difference in favor of the latter route of 1,914 miles, or more than two-thirds of the distance across the Atlantic. But these figures, which we take from a speech by Hon. Reverdy Johnson, in the United States Senate a few days ago, give but a partial idea of the superior dvantages of the Pacific Railroad for the articles of luxury or use, combining high value with small bulk or weight, like silks and teas. The value of the trade to London in these two commodities alone for the five years preceeding 1865 was over two hundred millions of dollars.

The Suez Canal is situated in a quarter of the world not civilized and not free from requent broils and troubles; not to say also, that it is controlled by an ambitions nation, the jealous rival of England in Europe. If the Canal should be closed to the trade of London, the distance to China and Japan, by any other than the American route, would be increased by onsiderably over four thousand miles. These figures suffice to give us an idea of superior opportunities about to be opened for American trade with the East, when we consider the constantly increasing importance of saving time in commercial transit. and the value of safe, regular and unlimited accommodations. The Asiatic trade of most

sia, will mainly pass over the Pacific Rail-road. Our own trade, already of great importance, will be immensely increased. Vitiation of Air by Artificial Illumination Chicago mothers.
