The Erie Railway Disaster.

A letter to a New York journal thus describes the scene of this latest and most shocking horror:

It will be remembered by those who have traveled over the Erie Railroad that from the point at Port Jervis, where it first strikes the Delaware, for over twenty-five miles in greater part, the pathway for the train has been hewn out of the precipitous rock which flanks the river on that side. In many places there is but a single track, the cars as they pass along seem suspended in air, as their outer edges hang over the rocks which rise from the river's brink sometimes to a height of 150 feet to the car plateau, and where far above them tower the rugged summits bleak and barren but for the few straggling pines that crown them. This pathway for the steam engine scooped out of the rock follows the winding of the river, making in a hundred places sharp and always dangerous curves. At Carr's Rock, one of these curves, and probably one of the worst on the whole line, commences for the cars coming toward New York. Here the train describes almost a semi-circle while traversing about 1,500 feet. The height of the embankment, midway in this curve, is 60 feet, sloping rapidly to a plateau underneath, about 150 feet distant, itself high above the river's level. At this point, before the construction of the road, there was a deep gorge. This was bridged over to allow the winter torrents from the hills to escape in this way and save the track from inundation. This bridge, or culvert as it is called by the railroad men, is sustained by great heavy stone buttresses —one on either side the creek, which is perhaps about 20 feet in width.

On reaching the nearest end of this curve, about 700 feet on this side of the bridge, the scene of the affair spread itself before me. Down in the gorge at the foot of the embankment lay the wreck, yet unconsumed by fire, of the four cars which fell over. On either side of the torrent which rushed through the bridge, lay shapeless piles of wagon tires, wheels, twisted iron-work, panels of carriages, stoves, the marble slabs of the wash-stands, brass fittings from the wood-work of the cars, broken mirrors and shreds of half-burned clothing still smoking slowly as the fire fought with the miserable rain-drizzle falling upon them at the time. On neither side of the creek were there any evidences of human remains. Of the car which had been consumed, there was no longer ruin enough left to hide a single blackened bone. The other three had been torn to pieces in the liberation of the wounded and afterward it appears were set on fire and consumed—why, is a something for conjecture. Leaving this sickening scene, and ascending the bluff on hands and knees, we again reached the track above, and went to the other extreme end of the curve, where still lay the broken rail, and where the ill-fated cars first began their horrible dance of death.

The same letter adds: "Although no inhabitant of Port Jervis is among the dead or wounded, this fearful calamity has awakened the most intense feeling among the people, and business may be said to be entirely suspended. Not a few of these discuss the management of the road, and express their astonishment that this thing did not occur long since. They are not slow either to give direction to their censure. They say that the condition of this Delaware division of the line has long been known as dangerous in the extreme; that new rails have been applied for again and again, and that those who knew of their necessity, and whose duty it was to make these applications, were unable to obtain them; that the worst description of iron was supplied when supplied at all, and that when remonstrance was made to this, and a better quality of rail asked for, the reply was, "they cost too much." Talking to an employé of the line at the door of the hotel, last night, about the condition of the track, not then having seen it myself, I said to him: "Are there any other bad rails at that dangerous place that you saw?" I understood him to say in reply, "Four," and repeated the word after him, when he said, excitedly: "Four! my God! no, Sir, but four hundred!"

California Avalanches.

The recent avalanches of Sierra and Placer counties remind the travelers on the coast of California that our State does not belong to the clime of the sun. Though snow is never seen in San Francisco, a distance of two degrees brings us into a region where the reign is perpetual. Along a line of three hundred miles the Sierra rises to a height of more than seven thousand feet, with only a few narrow passes below that level; and at that elevation snow lies throughout the year in the ravines on the northern slopes of the mountains.

The condensation of moisture is greater, as a general rule, on the sides of the highest mountains. The greater the elevation on the Sierra Nevada, the greater the rain fall, until we reach about six thousand feet, above which point snow succeeds.

There are many places in the State where rain is a comparative rarity, though snow falls ten or twelve feet deep in average winters, and forty or fifty in very severe ones. La Porte, Howland Flat, Summit Lake and all the higher peaks are in this class. At all the towns named the snow is now higher than the one-story houses, and the people go from house to house either through tunnels, or they climb upon staircases from their houses to the top of the snow, and travel on snow-shoes. The snow will lie this year as it did last in the streets of Howland Flat, till the 1st of June, and just back of the town on the hillside, it will lie two months longer. But in the narrow canons, especially those at a higher elevation, the snow will drift in to be two hundred feet deep, and will lie there from year to year, forming small glaciers, which, though they seem to be of solid ice a few feet from the surface, are constantly moving down hill. The speed of the movement depends on the grade, and in places where the land is nearly level may not exceed one or two feet in the course of a year. The glacier dwells on the gentle slope, the avalanche on the steep one. When the snow accumulates beyond a certain amount on a declivity, it must slide off, and it moves with a tremendous power. The Cisco avalanche, according to the Sacramento Reporter, was five or six miles long, and it must have carried with it a body of snow at least ten feet deep and probably half a mile wide, and a weight of more than 5,000,000 tons. If the seven locomotives caught by the snow are not demolished, it must be because the avalanche did not strike them, or its force was exhausted before it reached them.

We have had three fatal avalanches this week. The first occurred on the 4th inst., at the Independence Mine, on the Downieville Butte, carrying away part of the quartz mill, and killing two men. The second occurred at the Keystone Quartz Mine, three miles south of the Sierra Butte, on the 5th inst. Part of the mill was carried away and five men were killed. The third, the date of which is not given, occurred at Cisco, on the 4th and 5th inst., and killed six men. Thus, within one week thirteen men have lost their lives, and the injury to property is certainly not less than $100,000.—Alta California, March 8.

Our Wives and Daughters.

How many husbands treat their wives with constant and tender care for their happiness? How many who do not make it unpleasant for their wives to ask for money? How many who do not shrug their shoulders when a trip to the sea shore and mountain is mentioned? How many who do not return from their business at night cross and disagreeable? How many husbands who spring to their feet whenever there is an opportunity to save a step for the wife? How many who seek daily and hourly to add to the happiness of the one whose happiness they have declared to be so essential to their own? How many who do not begrudge the expense of servants, who think to take home the little appliances that can make a housewife's work light, who plan for recreations and amusements, whc praise the care and taste which make for them so attractive a home? How many husbands could pass the test of interrogatories like these?

The fact is, six men out of ten treat their wives most shamefully. Instead of that tenderness for her which marked the first burst of their interest, they are apt to be sour, petulent and imperious. They make little else than slaves of their wives. They compel them to ask for money; they feel that they must frown down every plan for pleasure, and, least of all, never think or speak in praise of that which the wife has done for their happiness. The lives of most husbands are of one long train of grumbling and fault finding. They are blind to the happiness of the one whose life to them is a never-failing joy and inspiration. In many cases they are more courteous and pleasant to the wives of their neighbors than their own.

Husbands, try our plan for a little while and see how it results. Go home and pack up your trunks and take your wives and daughters to the springs, to the mountains, to the shore. What if you have to neglect your business a little—you cannot afford to neglect your wife. You pledged most sacredly not to, and she looks to you for the fulfillment of your vows. Do not wait to be entreated; suggest the thing yourself, and so will the answering love be greater. And while you are making amends for neglect of your wife, follow up your good impulse by making a pleasant plan for your daughters. So shall you have a happy family and a happy home—and so will you be more happy yourself.—New York Evening Gazette.

Home-Made Barometers.

[From the Boston Journal of Chemistry.]

Take two sheets of pasteboard paper of any convenient size—say three feet long by two feet wide. Bring the ends together, and glue or paste them tight, each sheet by itself; and they will look like two pieces of paper stove-pipe. Cut thin, round boards exactly to fit in the ends of these paper cylinders. Carefully glue or nail them tight. Now you have two air-tight paper drums with wooden heads. Take a pole of any length you desire—three feet or twelve feet—let one drum be fastened to each end of the pole. Now balance this pole with the drums on each end, on nice pivots, in the middle. Then bore a gimlet through the end of one drum, and you have a good farmer's barometer. One drum is air-tight; one has a hole in it; so there will be more or less air in one drum than there is in another, according as the surrounding air is dense or rarefied. Consequently, in dense or heavy air, the tight drum rises, while the one with the pinhole in it goes down. Crosswise through the middle of the bar or pole, should run a stick as large as one's finger, a foot long, with wire gudgeons, on which the instrument should vibrate or teeter. Let the ends of the pole be slightly lower than the middle that the whole do not make a somerset; smear all with glue or oil, so that no air enter only in the puncture mentioned. Have something you can slide through the bar, to keep it nearly level. Mark, if you please, figures along the pole, to show how far you have moved the balancing poise; though for this there is but little need. This instrument may not be so perfect as a costly barometer; but for all practical purposes it is all one could ask. I have had one more than a year. I look at it a dozen times a day. They could be made and afforded for fifty cents a piece. They could be made as long as a barn, and placed on the loft, with an indicator, to show the distant mower when to make his hay.

How Advertisers are Duped.

The business men in almost every community, says the Buffato Courier, have taken from them thousands of dollars annually by a class of men whose sole business is to invent devices for special advertising, and who give no adequate return for the same. If the actual loss to the advertiser lay in the amount paid for his advertisement extraordinary, it would not be so bad, but when it induces in his mind the complacent belief that he has done all that is necessary to be done to inform the public where his place of business is, and what he will sell for, the thing becomes in a greater or less degree disastrous to his business. Of all the inventions which have been made known to the advertiser, the most effective medium which to make himself manifest to the public is the daily newspaper. The same amount of money that is thrown away on bulletin boards, frames, hotel registers, street railroad cars, calenders, and all the other devices of the enemy, would give the advertiser a prominent "display" in the columns of a newspaper, where he would be recognized every day in the year by one or fifty readers, till his name became as a household word. The fact is, there are a great many men who acknowledge the absolute necessity of advertising, who do not hesitate to attribute their success to it, and yet do not comprehend the philosophy of advertising, and who, if they gave the subject the same thoughtful attention they do to other branches of their business, might save to themselves a sum more than equal to any demand a newspaper might make upon them.

A LOMBARD PAPER relates a curious incident that lately occurred in Brescia. A male child was put out to nurse immediately after its birth, with a woman living at some distance from the city. Three months afterwards the parents called to see it. The nurse produced a girl baby and insisted that this was their child. By dint of threats she was, however, obliged to confess that with the hope of earning a double fee she had carried the boy to the foundling hospital and the next day had presented herself at that institution to adopt a child supposing she would receive the same she had left. It turned out that she has received a girl. On inquiry at the hospital it was discovered that at the hour when the child of these distracted parents was left there, another male child was also deposited and there were no distinguishing marks. The father, reasoning that he might always be tormented with doubts if he left either, concluded to adopt both, and did so.

A NEW ANECDOTE is told of George IV. When in his later years the Regent arrogated to himself, as he was wont to do, the title of "peacemaker of Europe," somebody spoke of the fact to Sheridan. "Oh," said old Sherry, "that is nothing. What the Regent chiefly prides himself on is last year's extraordinary harvest."
