

The Pittsburgh Gazette.

FROM A JUNE IDYL.

BY JAMES MELL LLOWELL.
May is a ploughland of the heart,
A gently paroxysm of real Spring;
Shaped out of snow and frost, with eastern wind
And with her handful of anemones.

Herself as a girl, she has come
Home to her nest but torn her hours round

And Winter suddenly has crept in at her.

Her building dreams have been shattered,

With frosty winds that wailed with the board.

She has been sick, weary, wailed with the board.

Whom she loves, she has seen in her dreams.

I take my doorway down into the hall,

Where a perch is open with full birds in the row,

And sing a lullaby whose fresh wood

Whispereth with music and mirth to the year.
