sun rises in the mist. A vague bluish light seems to descend with the snow-flakes. Here and there pines and birches, covered with icicles, tremble and moan in the wind. In a sort of ravine are to be seen a few wretched cabins; from the snow-clad roofs, made of bark, ascend blue clouds of smoke;

those who look out of the low windows of those cabins behold a flock of ravens on the dazzling white plain. "We are far from Paris, fifty leagues from seem to have been made rather for wild boars than for men.

"The poor people here live in the same room with their cattle. A miserable stove emits painful sounds, in the middle of the On the ground, in a motley group, lie goats, sheep and children, stretching their necks wistfully toward the kettle on the hearth. These children are dressed in rags. Under a window in the roof sits the mother spinning. The father, smoking a pipe, sits in a corner of the room. Every now and then are heard from without the merry sounds of jingling sleigh-bells, or the dull noise of a horse galloping past; a sleigh darts : past with lightning speed. In the same manner there appears and disappears a fur cap, fur robe, a fur jacket; then the father's voice drowns the noise of the spinning-wheel, the seething kettle on the stove.

"Christina!" From the group of the children there emerges the shapely head of a very pretty girl, surrounded by a crown of straw-colored, soft and silky hair.

"Christiana, take your violin and go to the hight.'

Upon her first appearance in a public concert, where she sang a few simple national songs, she electrified the whole andience and elicited the most rapturous applause. Finally, when her professora in Stockholm buld no longer teach her anything new she went to Paris, where Professor Wartel completed her musical education, and where she soon after achieved such marvelous triumphs on the stage of the Theatre Lyrique

"The salon, the only place in this sanctuary to which profane persons have as yet gained access, is in white and gold, and its furniture is covered with blue damask. It has only one window and three doors; that on the right leads to the bed chamber of the istress, that on the left to the room of the lady of company, and the third communicates with a passage leading to the anteroom

"The mantle-piece is made of Parian marble, and so beautifully wronght are the bronze ornaments on it that it can but de light the eyes of all lovers of the style of Louis, the Fifteenth, There is, however, nothing stall of those little knicknacs indicating the cocodette or coquette. Against the wall, opposite to the window, stands a plano; beside it a sola and a gueridon. The piano is loaded with music books; the sofa and gueridon are loaded with bouquets. siThe hands of the clock point to midnight.

Before the piano site a young lady. Her dress, tasteful though simple, reaches up to the threat. Her hand, with the shape-ly though sorrewhat long fingers, touches the keys of the instrument, while her eyes wander about the room, and are fixed now on her handsome slippers, now on the win-dow curtains, through which the gas lights of the Rue de Rivoli are to be seen. "She is absorbed in deep reflections; she seems to listen for something in her past. Does she not, perhaps, think of the immor-tal masters to whose compositions she has just given expression ? "No, she calls to mind the days of her childhood; she hears again those words which speak more impressively to her heart and soul than the music of Mozart :
