THE Temps of Paris relates the following curious case : "About midnight on Monhave created a thirst for blood, and I had scarcely retired to the tent when I heard the most fearful screams, and running to day, Madame residing in the Fou-bourg St. Antoine, proceeded to burn a large packet of letters which, if discovered, would have revealed a lation which she carried on for some time. She placed the letters in the grate and then set fire to them. the door saw the proprietor of a saloon op-posite, heating his 'woman,' giving her, what the western roughs call a 'mule persuader.' It was a brutal and sickening sight. He held her with his left hand and struck her with his right, till it seemed to me every blow could be heard a hundred In a short time a loud noise was heard, ac-companied by an oath, and a tall, thin man, yards. He was a large, powerful man, she a light, medium-sized woman, and the blood followed every blow, while her screams chilled my blood.
