FLOBENCE'S LOVE. BY H. H. BOONE. The day was damp, and chilly. The foliage of the trees hung limp and motionless in the air; on now and then, shivered and rustled while the cold breeze ran through it. The bleakness outside caused me to shrink closely within my comfortable room, while Florence touched the cords of the piano, in the partor below, with such pathos as to make me weep, though I searcely know why || Bcarcely know why ?: Ah, me | I think so; and yet why did a picture float before my mind, a photograph of the incidents and actors of other days, when I heard those same pathetic tones drifting through my consciousness, like fragments of heavenly dreams ? Tears are unbecoming-so the world says!

and the world is a most reliable oracle; therefore, I repressed them with a deter-mined will, and turned them back upon the brain ! But still Florence played: I won-dered if she, too, was weeping ? Where were her thoughts ? Full well I knew. They were going forth, like mourning vir-gins, to the burial of a life joy-a joy which died and left her utterly desolate, and widowed her soul. I frequently wonder why some hearts are peculiarly tried in the alem-bic of suffering and temptation , while others go through life without an experience which stirs them from the regular monotony of or-dinary existence. Certain people alternate between joy and sorrow, from year to year, until they are but abadows of their former selves; others live along upon the same plane, serves, others hve along upon are same plane, from day to day, without any event to clearly mark a single hour. If say that I wonder at these things—and the more so, while I list-ened to the music which Florence was sending forth upon the sir, and which I knew W88 8 TOOL Shall I give a retrospect, and thus explain my meaning? One summer, when the heated term came on, my ward, Florence, fatigued with the studies of her graduation year, besought me to give her a glimpse of country scene, I was at once disposed to yield to the request of the child, as I had been accustomed to call her; but s desire to tease her, and thus make her doubly would importune me to grant the favor, caused me to give an evasive answer.

say yes ?". The beautiful girl stood looking into my face, the very embodiment of beauty: Hereves, which at ordinary times were blue as eyes, which as of summer, were almost black with animation and expectancy. Her cheeks were slightly flushed, and her lips parted by the sweetness of smiles. For the first time I realized that the child Florence had de-My consin, in her own embarrassment, did not notice my sgitation. Ever afterwards, I carried a deep love in my heart of which nobody knew, except myself. And this is the reason why I remain a bachelor. Afterwards, a strange destiny placed Florence, the child of my cousin, in my care and that of my widowed sister, who presided over my household. Her father and mother had been the victims to a fatal epidemic, and their dying request was that I should be the guardian of their child. How little they understood the sad pleasure with which I consented to grant their wishest

I need not give the details of the years of anxiety and loy which came to me, after little Florence became an inmate of my house. I leave such matters to the compresion of those who have human idols which they worship. Florence stood before me, as I have be and then left for the interior of the country, was of sufficient importance to demand my mediate presence.

One afternoon, when the air was exhilaclear pool below me. Some weeks had elapsed since I had left the haunts of civilization, and for some reason, a longing came over me to return to business again! This over me to return to outness again! This fealing came upon me suddenly and inex-plicably, the atmosphere so halmy and de-lightful, seemed to become oppressive.
