> In getting up this strike the workmen were clearly and shamefully in the wrong. Their svowed design was, by stopping production, to send up the price of coal in the principal markets, so as to enable them to demand increased compensation. It is altogether doubtful, if they had succeeded in doing exactly what they proposed, whether they would not have entailed a pecuniary loss upon themselves instead of making a gain. As it was, they have spent some weeks in idleness, consuming the Such a park, with clumps of forest trees savings of months of precious labor; and this is a dead loss. Had they continued the strike for so long a period as to send up the price of coal for the residue of the year, the stronger companies would not have advanced wages, because, in so doing, they would have placed themselves in the wrong before the public, and have created justifying reasons for the repeal of the duty on foreign coal.
