haste or carelessness might be ascribed to more serious causes. But in periodica literature and in our books there are no these excuses, and yet here, too, we find these excuses; and yet here, too, we find an increase of intensity at the cost of continuity. It seems, in short, though in a sense not before dreamed of, an age of "modern instances," Particular cases are generalized into rules with a celerity that speaks much for our brilliancy, but your little indeed for our soundness. To very little indeed for our soundness. To illustrate, we met the other day in a paper the broad head-line "Life in the West."

The article immediately following was a telegram from some far Western State, glving an account of a distressing quarrel, in which two men had fought, and one killed the other with a bowie-kille. It was not stated but that in any Fasters six an every-day matter would not have been leemed important enough to telegraph. And yet, though this was an exceptional case, and might have occurred anywhere, the title to the intelligence was "Life in in the West; hang it, they are always killing folks out there, and down went the heading "Life in the West." Now this kind of reasoning is not masculine, but feminine. A thoroughly masculine mind would say, Man killed—sad affair; and down it would go as "A Man killed at ..." The difference is noticeable.

one man killed at one point, and records it as just what it is, an instance. The womanized mind instantly generalizes the special point into the whole West, and the particular slayer into the general tendency of the entire population. This is precisely the feminine mode of ratioci-nation. At the mention of a man slashed

With this the reader is in possession of his own estimate as to how far that tena much greater extent than is altogether consistent with a state of general intellectual health. That it makes men more sympathetic is no doubt true, but quite as true, we fancy, that it renders them less just. Woman is more sympathetic than man, and yet a chief justice, bench, bar and jury, in petticoats, would be apt to make wild work with any ordinary dock-of the law. That rigid continuity of thought which has reflection for its syn onyme is not for woman, and yet if man recedes from it while woman does not approach, it is easy to see that the corela tion of mental forces becomes impaired.

The practical effect of this derangement is often grievous, for there are not lacking those who, while free from it themselves, do not scruple to use it in others for their own purposes. A remarkable instance of such use we remember in a late four million persons, a very remarkable, and, so far as our reading and observation go, altogether unparalleled circumstance of a purely personal nature. To suppose that the fallacy of his generalization was not known to the members in question would be to insult an exceedingly acute intelligence, and that, knowing it to be a fallacy, he put it forth as good reason in a singular evidence of his belief in, and disposition to take advantage of, a preva-lent deterioration of the American logical make the exception, not the proof of the rule, but the rule, is the peculiarity, we repeat, of the feminine intellect, and the question is, whether the masculine mind is not exhibiting a tendency to the same mode of ratiocination, or, in other words

An exchange says: An intelligent traveler, named Jonas Wells, from Ritchie county, West Virginia, called at our office yesterday, and stated that he had just been delivered from a certain death—that a spider which entered his head and was one man killed at one point, and records reying upon the brain had been extricated a few minutes before. The circumstances are these: On Tuesday night last, Mr. Wells found himself in the country, and wishing to "turn in" for the night, laid down upon some straw and was soon wrapped in the arms of Morpheous. During his slumber, it is supposed, the spider was out late at night and coming in mistook the stranger's ear for his web and accordingly crept in, unconscious to the sleeping, weary mas. On awakening in the morning, Mr. W. experienced pain in his head, but did not concern himself much about it, thinking it would soon pass away. He suffered the most excruciating pain, the effects of which almost made him blind, and he concluded to wend his way to town and seek medical aid to relieve his misery. He sought a drug store, and entering requested the clerk to drop from a feather a small quantity of turpentine into his ear. No soonin his head longer, it would have reached the brain and death would certainly have been the result. He is now entirely re-
