In what way, then, can the reformation of criminals be best secured? The first thing to be done in this direction is to reform the prisons in which they are confined. The great majority of prisons are nothing better than schools of vice. The Superint tendents of many of them are men who do not conform to the laws of morality, are destitute of the finer feelings of his manity, and have no proper appreciation of the object for which criminals are placed under their care. Hence they frequently for the indicated the morality are men, too, in many instances, who is many instances, who is many instances, who is an an accountable creatures.
