DAY AND NIGHT.

Day cried the Earth, " AWAKE !- AWAKE ! And with a ruler's power Summoned its legions to their tasks, In city, vale and bower.

She bade the weary traveler rise, And onward wend his way, And raised the savage hunter's bow Against the flying prey.

She warned the merchant to his desk, The student to his tome. The sailor to his toil and strife Against the salt sea's foam :

She called the farmer to his plough, Amid the furrowed glade, The whisker'd so dier from his tent Forth to his slaughter-trade;

The seamstress to her needle turn'd, The sad-brow'd laborer bent, And downward to his cavern dark The mornful miner went.

The old man leaning on his staff A quickening mandate feels; The tottering infant steals.

Night speaks to Day-"Your tasks are heard You've wearied all the race; I'll fold them in my pitying arms For downy Sleep's embrace.

Of core, I smooth the wrinkling trace That you so deep have made, Take from the statesman's breast its load, From Labor's hand the spade.

Of Grief, I soothe the gushing tear, Of meagre Want the sigh, Vex'd brain, and bloodshot eye.

And thus the holy Night began Its ministry of love.
