—For the Jeffersonian.

Passages from Milton's "Paradise Lost."

John Milton was born at London in the year 1608. John Milton, his father, a scrivener by profession, lived in a reputable manner on a competent estate, entirely his own acquisition. Being disin-herited in early youth by his parents, for renouncing the communion of the Romish Church, he assiduously set about realizing an independence for himself, by perseverance in literary pursuits.

The young poet was the great favorite of his father's hopes; and having by careful foresight, detected the inborn genius which early displayed itself, he was at the expense of procuring a domestic tutor; whom Milton afterwards celebrated in a Latin elegy. He seldom quitted his studies before midnight, and often complained of a severe pain in his head, and weariness in his eyes, which finally ended in the total privation of his sight. From his domestic studies he was removed to St. Paul's School, to cultivate his classics under the care of Dr. Gill; and transferred from thence to Christ College, in Cambridge, where he was distinguished for his superiority in all kinds of academical exercises. In Cambridge he continued to be a member, till he became Master of Arts; and then retired to Horton, in Buckinghamshire, where he pursued his studies with success.

Then commenced his literary and political career. He traveled through France and Italy, and intended to take a survey of Greece and Sicily, but was compelled to relinquish his project and return to England. At Paris he became acquainted with the celebrated Grotius, through

Lord Viscount Soudamore, the ambassador from Charles I; and in Rome, Genoa, Florence, and other cities, he contracted a friendship with persons of the highest reputation and learning.

He returned to England at the very time when the great Revolution was about to throw desolation and bloodshed over the land. He received and protected his father-in-law, who being a vigilant es-posuer of the King's cause, was exposed to ejection and persecution from the
