PROPER HOURS OF SLEEP.
BY MARY C. BUCKMAN.

"What amount of sleep is necessary for a woman who is constantly employed in house work?" When this question was referred to us we were almost inclined to consider it an unfair one, and were strongly convinced of our incompetency to answer it in a satisfactory manner. Since then we have given it but little thought, and now, at the last moment, find we know not in what light to view it, as you are all perhaps aware there can be no rule that will apply in all cases. But, connecting with our own rude thoughts some ideas of one of our eminent writers upon the same subject, we offer you the following answer:

Our health and happiness depend very much on the way in which we regulate our lives. Strange as it may appear there is a discipline which should be observed in our sleeping, as well as in our working hours. But, after all, what is sleep?—Our medical philosophers puzzle themselves in vain to account for it. There is no better description giving of the approach of sleep than that which we find in one of Leigh Hunt's papers.

"It is a delicious moment, certainly, that of being well nestled in bed, and feeling that you shall drop gently to sleep.—The good is to come, not past; the limbs have been just tired enough to render the remaining in one posture delightful; the labor of the day is done; a gentle failure of the perceptions comes creeping over one; the spirit of consciousness disengages itself more and more, with slow and hushing degrees, like a mother detaching her hand from that of her sleeping child; the mind seems to have a balmy lid closing over it, like the eye—'tis closing, 'tis closed. The mysterious spirit has gone to take its airy rounds." But what is the immediate cause of sleep?

There can be no doubt that a certain amount of nervous energy is necessary to support the activity of the body; and when this is exhausted by the exertions of the day, the organs of animal life become fatigued and unable any longer to perform their functions. Hence their prostration, arising from the want of their usual nervous stimulus, superinduces a state of sleep. The perception of external objects becomes confused; the eyes grow dim; the lips drop in spite of every effort to uphold them; then the muscles of the back and neck relax their tension; the head falls forward, or to one side or the other, and the body sinks, as far as circumstances will permit, into a horizontal position. But the sense of hearing remains for a period after that of sight, so that we may hear the conversation of persons around us long after we are unable to perceive their gestures, and discriminate the object of their remarks.—Now, if this state arise, as we believe it does, from a deficiency or exhaustion of nervous energy, the more perfectly developed we shall find the nervous system, the greater will be the amount of sleep required to recruit the animal of strength.

If we take a glance through the different gradations of the animal kingdom, beginning with insects, we shall find that although many, like the common house fly, remain for months in a state of torpidity, yet they may continue wakeful and cheerful throughout the year, in fact they scarcely sleep at all. We shall next observe that in fishes the nervous system is only imperfectly developed, therefore they require little sleep, and when asleep they may be observed almost motionless in the water, in which state they may be easily netted or even taken with the hand; but if suddenly touched they start in an instant and swim away in evident alarm. The serpent tribes, which rank somewhat higher in the scale of organization, remain awake many days and nights and then have long periods of repose. The boa constrictor, after gorging itself to repletion, will remain for many days and weeks motionless and insensible.

As we proceed still higher in gradation, we shall find that birds sleep much more than fish or reptiles. But the slightest noise or movement will awaken them, as was evinced by the cackling of the sacred geese which saved the Capitol of Rome from the soldiers of Brennus, when the watch-dogs and sentries were sleeping at their posts.

When we arrive at the different orders of quadrupeds the brain and spinal marrow appear more fully developed, and the consequence is that in obedience to their instincts, those which are active by day sleep by night, and those which roam abroad in quest of prey during the night sleep by day. They accommodate themselves so far to the uses of "civilization,"

The monkey tribes, particularly some of the smaller species, are very restless. But the great baboon or chimpanzee, the organization of whose brain is said to very closely resemble that of man, will take his six or eight hours sleep if undisturbed. We therefore come to the conclusion that the more fully developed the nervous system is, the greater will be the quantity of sleep required. Hence, it has been truly remarked that "man sleeps longer than any of the larger animals."

In a state of health sleep not only contributes to the prolongation of life, but enhances the conscious pleasure even of our existence. In order, however, that we may enjoy the many advantages bestowed upon us, it behooves us to consider in what manner sleep should be disciplined, for when we consider "how use doth breed a habit in a man," it is obvious that even this "wide blessing" may be strangely abused. We may, therefore, fairly ask, what is the quantity of sleep which a reasonable person should be contented with?

Yet this is still a somewhat difficult question. We have seen it stated that tall and bulky people require more sleep than short and thin people; men than women; and all animals sleep longer in winter than in summer. Age, constitution, climate, occupation, and a variety of incidental causes must be taken into consideration.

The faculty of remaining asleep longer than is necessary cannot be indulged in without impairing the strength of the body and mind. The continued depression of the nervous system and excessive transpiration occasion physical debility, which the intellectual faculties, from constantly slumbering in a state of inactivity, become gradually enfeebled.

In a state of health the amount of sleep required to restore the nervous energy averages, we think, from six to eight hours. We believe that six hours is with some constitutions sufficient, but it is not so in all cases. Yet we hesitate not in saying that there many woman who "constantly employed in house work" gets no longer period of rest, particularly if she has a flock of little lambs to clothe and care for. Yet we answer most emphatically that she really requires seven or eight hours sleep to sufficiently refresh her for the labors of the following day.

The laws of nature may be tampered with, but they cannot be subverted; we may step out of the paths she has prescribed, but we cannot go far beyond them with impunity. It needs scarcely any evidence to prove that the day was intended for exercise, and the night for repose; yet many persons, forgetting that this is the order of nature, endeavor to what is familiarly called "turn day into night." The result of this bad custom is sooner or later severely felt.

Whatever may be the quantity of sleep required, early rising is essential to health, and promotes longevity. Nevertheless, the morning snooze has, we confess, many temptations; and we trust "a woman who is constantly employed in housework" will not be dealt harshly with if she does indulge occasionally in just one more little nap.

We Americans, as a class, spend too much time in unnecessary labor. While we are the slaves of fashion, as we are to-day, we must expect to work, and in many instances deprive ourselves of hours of sleep. Let us hope for more uniformity of customs and habits before many years shall pass away.

A man in Pennsylvania has invented a rat trap that is made to operate upon the selfish passions of the poor rat and lure him into trouble. The Mechanic and Farmer, in a description of the trap, says that a mirror is set in the back part of the device, beyond the bait, and as his ratship is out on a foraging expedition he spies the bait, and at the same time he believes his own image in the mirror to be another rat making for it on the opposite side. This is too much for a rat nature to stand and be cool over, so he rushes for the bait and is caught.

A story is told of a Daventry boy who two years ago was given ten cents, which he invested in matches, and sold at retail, and reinvested the proceeds in trade, and to-day is worth one thousand one hundred and fifty dollars, all made in legitimate trade from that ten cents.

The other day a man in Kentucky, finding a neighbor pinned to the ground by a tree that had fallen on his leg, lifted it off. After the excitement was over he and two others tried to lift the tree again but could not budge it.

Can it be possible that a rogue can climb the outside brick wall of a lofty city mansion to the second story window with no aid but that of strong india rubber suckers? Yet this is said of Forrester, the supposed Nathan murderer.

Maine now puts in a claim for the model town. It is called Dayton, and has neither public debts, lawyer, liquor saloon, nor lock up and its morals are so pure, in fact, that no minister of the Gospel is needed.

"A young widow" advertises in a Cincinnati paper that she has an income of $3000 a year, and will marry any man, young or old, who possesses the same means, and can produce a certificate of good character.

John Hammond, on the farm of William M. Shakespear, near Wyoming, Del., has raised the present season a large pair of the Duchess variety, which weighs twenty-two ounces. He wants to know who can beat it.

A premium is offered at a California fair to the young woman who shall prepare the best dinner at the smallest cost.

All the slate pencils made in the United States are made in Vermont. The sales amount to from $15,000,000 to $18,000,000 per year.

An Illinois farmer ships a car load of corn daily, and has about 500,000 bushels of corn to dispose of.
