Original Poetry.

The following lines were sent to us or publication. Original poetry is somewhat scarce now a days. We therefore nake room for this effusion, especially as t may prove highly interesting to the ladies.

For the Sunbury American. THE DISAPPOINTMENT.

I courted Caro long and well, How much I lov'd, no tongue can tell ; I thought on all this earth, there be None half as fine, or fair as she. I also thought, that I could see, That lovely Caro, too, lov'd me. She always smil'd when e'er we'd meet Embrace so fondly; kiss so sweet.

I thought, to take her for my wife; To cheer me through the walks of life. Before I'd wed, I wished to go, The world to see; its ways to know. I went to see my Caro dear, Who to my heart was always near; And told her I must go away, But would return again, some day. She charged me to her, to be true Then kissed me sweetly; sighed adieu.

I went away; no matter where; And what I did, no one need care. Ten months or so, I stayed away; When I returned again, to pay My address to my own sweet heart; And thought from her, I ne'er would part, But marry her, and live a life Of happiness; with her my wife.

But to my sorrow I soon found, That I too long was running round Neglecting her she thought; so she Concluded not to wait for me; But, accepted another beau, And married him, some time ago. Who he is, and what the name Of him who has my loving dame; Now is not known as yet to me, And perhaps it shall never be.

They now indeed are man and wife, Oh! may they have a happy life; But still, I wish that I could be, But in his place; she'd married me. But now, I'll rove the wide world o'er And see perhaps Care once more.

I'll ce'er forget, though far away, The words of love I heard her say. Pil ne'er forget the time, when too, She kissed me sweetly, sighed adieu CHARLIE.
