THE OLD GRENADIER'S STORY. TOLD ON A RENCH OUTSIDE THE INVALIDES.

LY O. W. THORNDURY. Twas the day heside the Pyramids, This the day nesting the Pyrams, It seems but an hour ago, That Kieber's foot stood firm in squares, Returning blow for blow. The Mamalakes were tossing Their standards to the sky, When I heard a child's voice say, "My men, Teach mo the way to die !"

'Twas a little drammer, with his side Torn terribly with shot ; Bat still he feebly Leat his drum, As though the wound were not. And when the Mamaluke's wild horse Burst with a scream and ery. He said, "Oh, men of the Porty-third, Teach me the way to die !"

"My mother has got other sons With stouter hearts than mine, But none more ready blood for France, To pour out free as wine. Yet still life's sweet," the brave lad mouned. "Fair are this earth and sky; Then, comrades of the Forty-third, Teach me the way to die !

I saw Salanche of the granite heart Wiping his burning eyes-It was indeed more pitiful Than mere loud sobs and cries, One bit his catridge till his lips Grow black as wintry sky. But still the boy moaned, "Forty-third, 'Teach me the way to die !"

Then never saw I sight like that, The sergeant flung down the flug, Even the fifer bound his brow With a wet and bloody rog. They looked at locks and fixed their steel, But never made a reply, Until he sobbed out once again, "Teach me the way to dia !"

Then with a shout that flew to God. They strode into the fray ; I saw their red plumes join and wave,

Bat slowly mult away. The last who went-a wounded man-

Bade the poor boy, good by, And said, "We men of the Forty-third Teach you the way to die !"

I never saw so sad a look. As the poor youngster cast, When the hot smoke of cannon, In cloud and whirlyind pass'd. Earth shock and heaven answered ; I watched his engle eye, As he faintly moaned, "The Forty-third

Teach me the way to die ?" Then with a musket for a crutch

He limped into the fight; I, with a bullet in my hlp, Had neither strength nor might.

But proudly beating on his drum,

A fever in his eye, I heard him moan, "The Forty-third Taught me the way o die !'

They found him on the morrow, Stretched on the heap of dead; Ilis hands was in the grenadier's Who at his bidding bled. They hung a medal round his neck, And closed his dauntless eye ; On the stone they cut, "The Forty-third Taught him the way to die !"

'Tis forty years from then till now-The grave gapes at my feet-Yet when I think of such a boy, I feel my old heart beat. And from my sleep sometimes wake,

Hearing a feeble cry. And a voice that says, "The Forty-third Teach me the way to die !"
