Cultivation of the Cranberry.

Our readers know that we have printed in the Telegraph much in behalf of the cultivation of the Cranberry as a crop, by our farmers, in the belief that it would be found, when its culture was understood, to be as profitable. or a little more so, than the same ground could be occupied with anything else side, it can be raised upon spots on the farm almost or quite unfit for any other crop. At may rate there is not a farm of fifty acres. perhaps in the State, on which could not be found a spot where the cramberry could be cultivated successfully. At the last Agri-cultural Exhibition of the Bucks County Society, we saw the finest crapberries that ever met our eye, which the producer informed us were from upland cultivation.

The following article from the Granite State Former, refers to lowland cultivation, and contains many capital hints, worthy of the attention of our farmers, which we hope it will receive. [Hip. Germantown Telegraph,

I take the liberty of offering a few suggestions upon the cultivation of the cranberry. It is passing strange that so much is said. and so much time and money spent upon the cultivation of fruit in general, and so little said and done upon the cultivation of this most delicious and bealthful berry. But few appreciate the worth of this 'little sour taing," or we should see every farmer forthwith dedicating a small patch of his big farm to its growth. Some object to it because of its exceeding tartness, especially when sugar is so high as at the preset time. But let us take courage; the sagar cane will yet be riased by every farmer, and sugar will be manufactored at a cost far less than the present price of sweets. I think the subject will go hand in band, or ought to, at least,

It may not be generally known how cheaply cranberries can be raised, and how to they can be kept fresh and nice, with but lit-tle waste. I venture the assertion that they may be raised at a cost not above good Baldwin apples; yet they bring three times us much. They may be kept in a vessel of water, by changing it now and then, the year round. They should be kept in a cool cellar, and not allowed to freeze. But the point to come at first is, how to raise them, and let the keeping of them be of secondary importance. Having had a little experience in the matter, I venture to write it out. When the farm upon which I now live was purchased by my father, there existed upon it a shallow reservoir, containing about one nero. It was full of eels, pouts, blood suckers, and frogs, and many a spreedid the boys have "pouting," from a large rock on one side, and near a "deep hote."-Subsequently the water was allowed to run off, and it soon gave signs of vegetation. Sweet flag and willows predominated. In the fall of 1849 I took the liberty of trying an experiment on the old frog pond, Many an incredulous smile played over the faces of my neighbors as they possed by and beheld me plunging about in the mud, tearing up willows and pulling up sweet flag turf. I was then young. and they called it one of my notions, I remember of receiving encouragement only of one man,-an old gray headed farmer-he said to me, "Go on; it will be worth more than railroad stock!" I did go on, and spent some S15 in work and fencing, eight years ugo this fall, and fifty dollars would not buy the crap I have taken from the vines this year. Lust year I had some eight or ten bushels; I sold them for St per bushel. One year ago last spring I raited over four bushago this fall I raked three bushels, and sold them for 83 per bashed.—Putting the become of the last three years together, the amount

Readers of this article will ask perhaps, can't we go and do likewise? You can, and do even better, provided you begin right .-"How is that?" you will nak. Get rid of the grass on any wet soil, either by plowing deep. or taking off the furf; set your vines, two or three roots in a hill, three feet apart each way. If you can get it within half a mile. cover the soil two or three inches deep with sand, leaving the vines sticking through and above it. If you can flow it in winter, do so, and if it will flow over in summer, during heavy rains, so much the better. Let no singuant water be allowed to stand about the vines. If no sand can be conveniently had, let them take their chance, and they will set well and get the advantage of the grasses, but not so readily as it sand were put on. The variety should be considered, the large round berry being far the best; I would not take the other as a gift.

will not fail short of $100.

The best method of getting the roots is to use a common doug book. Strike the book into the roots, pull out a turf; a little way from this take out another; thus you may get your vines, and benefit what you leave by thinning. The bunches of roots taken out is this way will make some eight or ten hills

Some are trying the experiment of mowing the vines, running them through a bay-cutter, and then sowing them as you would grain, and harrow or rake them in. It is asserted that each joint in the vine will produce a new vine. I am inclined to think this will do on very wet soil, but the other is the more certain method .- [Z. BREED, Ware, N. H.
