

AGRICULTURAL.

The Comstock System of Culture.

The fifth number of Dr. Grant's agricultural publication, entitled 'Lepidoptera,' gives, among other matter, some account of the late Russell Comstock's system of planting trees and their subsequent treatment.

"He thoroughly learned (discovered, as he thought), what had been taught by more than one who went before him—that trees were generally, almost universally, covered to the injury of their health, and often to the destruction of their life."

"His judgments, formed and expressed concerning the precise character and condition of the roots from having seen only the branches on an excited surface, by their accuracy, as shown by subsequent examinations."

"The subject became so interesting to him, that he gave instruction gratuitously to many for planting their trees, and often aided in carrying out his directions by the labor of his own hands."

"His success was uniform, for, besides planting the trees properly, he rejected all of the many that were poorly suited for planting, teaching the purchaser, or the person to set them in a trial-ground or 'hospital,' placing them just so far apart that they would not crowd each other for a few years, until decision could be made as to whether they should be thrown away or received into full position."

"He showed peaches and plums, apples and pears of remarkable beauty and flavor, as well as remarkable trees, in various quarters where they had been grown by persons who had followed his directions, that were in striking contrast with those under ordinary treatment."

"The Harvest Club, at a recent meeting, were regulated with a 'table' that was universally praised. A committee of one was finally appointed, with a private secretary, to wait upon the skillful hostess and learn her choicest method of cooking king corn."

"The more simple the taste the greater the joy. We are assured that a cake made in this way is fit to set before a king. It may be a matter of parolitic pride that a native and peculiar cereal should be such a staff of life. Corn grows everywhere in this country abundantly and without disease and in cheaper quantities than any article of beautiful diet."
