After the war closed and Tennessee elected a new Legislature, he was chosen as a Union Senator to that body, where he discharged his duties with fidelity and honor. After going to his home from his labors in the State Senate, and as he and his family were returning from public worship on the Sabbath, his oldest surviving son, a lad about sixteen years old, walking a few steps in advance of the rest of the family, was shot by an unseen hand and died there in the presence of the father and mother and their affrighted and shricking children. But a short time after this event, on the public road, in broad daylight, and near his own dwelling, Dr. Case himself was attacked by ruffians and brutally murdered. "The disaster occurred on the night of the 6th at a spot called Beverara, nearly opposite the corn market. At one in the morning the drums announced that the peril was becoming menacing; at three a renewed beat and the sound of trumpets, mixed with cries of "Save yourselves!" brought the fatal news that the waters had forced a passage. To describe the heart-rending scenes which followed would be impossible. In an instant the water reached the first story of the house ; the gates of Montova and Boschetto were thrown down, and two frightful torrents poured along the adjoining streets. Happily, the stream took the direction of Vangadizza and spread in the valleys, hardly reaching the village of Sam Pietro. Most of the shops and warehouses are destroyed, the merchandise lost, and the furniture dispersed. Entire families are actually without bread. The neighboring villages received the dis-tressed inhabitants, and clothed, fed and nourished them as well as they could.
