His life is one of the hardest kind of work, and a most consuming excitement. Plethoric to-day-on the verge of bankruptey to-morrow; with nothing in the morning to pay a hundred thousand dollars in the afternoon. It is a life that wears faster than any other labor in the world. It is one everlasting, never ending strain, from morning till night, and if the cares of the day enable him to sleep at night, he is lucky. But nevertheless, there are a few old men in New York, who have survived the strain and wear or tear of business.

MAYOR HAVEMEVED is over seventy, and bids fair to live twenty years yet. He is of German descent, and though he has lived through all the exciting periods of New York history, has persistently refused to get at all excited. He has had a steady, standard business-sugar refining-and has followed it with all the steadiness of the German. He has taken active part in politics-he was Mayor thirty years ago-has been and is a bank President; but in all he lives quietly and mogood wholesome food, uses stimulants with great moderation, and always sails on an even keel.
