General Canby's Successor

Colonel Jefferson C. Davis, the officer who succeeds the murdered Canby in command of the United States forces operating against the band of Captain Jack, was, when the war broke out, a second lieutenant of artillery in Fort Sumter and distinguished himself in its stubborn defence under Major Anderson. Later, after his exchange, he operated in Missouri and Arkausas with the forces combatting the Confederate General Sterling Price. In these guished himself both as an infantry and cavalry commander, and at one time commanded a division. He subsequently was assigned to the command of General Nelson at Louisville in organizing troops at that point, but becoming involved in a difficulty with Nelson, weapons were drawn in the Galt House, and Davis killed his superior officer. He was tried by court martial and honorably acquitted. Still later he served as Brigadier General of infantry under Rosecrans in the Army of the Cumberland, and was raised to the rank of Major General of Volunteers, and commanded a division at Chickamaucommanded a division at Chickamauga and the battles about Chattanooga. In all his engagements he was noted for caution, able strategy and personal bravery, and was implicitly 35. trusted by his superiors and esteemed as a faithful officer. On the resignation of General (afterwards Governor) John M. Palmer, of Illinois; as commander of the old Fourteenth Army Corps, General Davis succeeded to the command, and remained its leader in all the battes during the summer campaign of 1864 against Atlanta, in the march to the sea and advance through the Carolinas to nezar creek in the rear of Savannah, Davis's command was so encumberin danger of attack and anninilation by the Confederate forces on its flanks
