Who is there that can realize London a deserted place and New York with-There is no worse economy than the stinting of food, or the administering of bad food because it is cheap. Also, there is no more wasteful practice than the giving of too rich and expensive food. Neither is there any greater source of loss in connection with the keeping of farm horses than the neglect to which they are systematically subject. The horse, even in the rudest state, is of a somewhat science the city claims precedence.

Who is there that can realize London a deserted place and New York without an inhabitant? Municipalities have a life which takes an aggregation of cause to extinguish. Time affects it but slightly, and even pestilence hardly changes it. The strength of a people physically and in production may be in the country, but in exchanges, industry, arts and science the city claims precedence.
