Over the hill-tops, feld upon fold,

On distant upland the lenely pine

The tapering cedar, like a spear,

Is tiaged with purple and bound with fire;

And the weather vane is a gilded wire.

The rocky ledge; and the herd appear

And braided banners of clouds are seen

To fiercer burn, as with sudden shame;

While the vale below and the hills between

Are drowned in a yellow mist of flame,

And a farmer's boy, all agiare with light,

Looks over the cliff where the cedars grow

And shades with his hand his dazzled sight,

And calls to his comrades down below !

Then the brazen woodlands celes and ring

The window westward flashes and glows;

And the swaltering landscape seems to swim.

A pearly arch in the hawk's fleet wing ;

On yonder hill side a cottage shines-

It neetles amid its shelt ering vines

And there in the porch two lovers woo-

The Treatment of Sunstroke.

General Jackson paid the money

A physician writes as follows to the Philadelphia Evening Star: A business man rushes from his counting room and devours a half-masticated dinner. This he washes down with a considerable qurntity of ice water, and, having seized his hat, he runs to his counting-room again. He seeks the shady side of the street, with the impression that here he is safe from a sunstroke; but he forgets the that his imperfectly-masticated dinmuscular exertion is creating great excitement in his blood.
