THE BAND OF THE ALLEGHENIES

An Incident in the Life of Lewis the Robber Chief of the Mountains.

In those days men were compelled to travel in coaches or on horseback.

The robbers and highwaymen of every country are the favorite heroes of romance.

Even the educated and the thinking part of the community do not altogether escape the infection.

The universality and depth of this feeling render it worthy the attention of philosophic minds.

Something more than the glamour of romance and man's natural admiration for energy and daring must be accounted for.

The native instincts of the average civilized man, his general impulses, are right; and opposed to theft and violence.

We take the moral side in books or plays. Even the wickedest appear virtuous on the stage.

The "poor but honest" young man defeats the machinations of the rich and heartless oppressor.

An audience whose daily conversation would not look well in print, whose garments are soiled by the muck of the market, are in raptures.

And applaud to the echo, the Heroine, poor, proud and virtuous as she escapes from the castle of her ravisher by a leap from the battlements.

destructive to everything of moral mould in the human breast.

By the aid of a mysterious individual invariably wrapped in a voluminous mantle, his features shrouded under a slouch hat and holding a dark lantern, whose language invariably bore an intonation of mystery.

"Hurry! 'Hurry!'" etc. in a deep, throat-rattling bass, even in the depths of the subterranean passage.

where sunlight never penetrates and the human voice is only heard once or twice in a century, on occasions of starting romance or an escape from the one under consideration.

As a rule people are law-abiding. Man possesses an innate reverence for authority, and powerful must be the reason, almost irresistible the impulse that drives whole communities to resist or imitate their real life.
