

THE MYSTERIOUS MARK.
"Roll on, thou dark and deep blue ocean roll!" shouted a cheerful looking passenger, spouting a patronizing glance at the billowy wave on whose heaving bosom our good ship was tossing like a plaything.
"Roll, and be damned!" grumbled I. "It is only a matter of time."
It was my first acquaintance with Neptune, and we didn't get on well together. To say the truth, I was in an amiable mood. I had disagreed with the steward upon the quality of the steak he had sent me for breakfast and parted company with it.
It was while leaning over the taffrail at this point, that my feelings were hurried by the poetical passenger's quotation.
"You are sea-sick," he remarked. "I am, I am," I answered to him, intending to say that I had a decided aversion to the self-obviousness of the statement.
"I am a sovereign specific for that malady," said the stranger.
"You are a lucky man," I grunted. "I should be happy to furnish you with it." He then handed me an abundant supply of it.
"Anything," said I, "I'll take anything—even arsenic enough to put me out of my misery."
"Come below," said he, taking my arm.
"Where's your state-room?" he inquired, when he descended the stairway.
"I led the way to it."
"Now lie down," said he, "and I'll fix you directly."
I threw off my coat and tumbled into my berth. The benevolent gentleman went out and returned quickly with something which he put into a glass with some water which he gave me to drink. I swallowed it without question.
The effect was almost instantaneous. A gentle languor seized me, and then followed a state of bliss before I had had time to get a notion of matrimonial pleasures.
Whether it was the effect of the medicine or because the weather grew calmer, I do not know, but when I awoke, which was after the lapse of several hours, I found myself, not recovered, at least convalescent. Next day I had gained my sea-legs, and felt no further inconvenience.
Mr. Rollickson—by which name I learned to know my Byronic benefactor—and we grew to be intimate friends—and was an inexhaustible talker. With men, he was an agreeable companion; with ladies, he was captivating, charming, fascinating.
We had an exquisite young creature on board, scarcely out of her teens, on her way to join an elderly widower aunt, in an island English town, said to have testamentary designs upon her, which, if carried out, would place her in the front rank of matrimonial prizes.
To this young lady Mr. Rollickson paid special court. He read, talked, and quoted poetry to her, till her pretty little head was turned, and before the voyage was over, their engagement began to be the talk of the ship.
Stress of weather made the passage a slow one. It was more than two weeks after we lost sight of the Highlands of Newberick before we landed at Liverpool.
I had hardly set my foot on shore and hadn't time to congratulate myself on the fact, when a hand was laid briskly on my shoulder.
"You must go with me," said a determined voice in my ear.
I turned about quickly, and found myself confronted by a man who might have set for Dickens' portrait of Inspector Bucket.
"The fewer words here the better," he added, as I was about to speak "Will you come quietly, or shall I summon assistance?"
I demanded an explanation.
"You shall have it in due time," was the reply. "Do you intend to come peacefully or not?"
A short staff, surmounted by a crown produced by the speaker, convinced me of his authority to enforce my obedience and I walked along by his side.
"Your name is Rollickson," said a thin, sharp man into whose presence I was at length ushered.
"It is not," I answered.
"A probable you will also deny having three stars tattooed on the back of your arm, just above the elbow?" he added, sarcastically.
"I do deny it," I said; "I bear no such mark."
"That is easily tested," was the reply.
"Turn up his sleeve, Jarvis." The assistant obeyed.
"I think we have the right man," said the officer.
"Quite sure of it," replied the sharp man, after a glance at the exposed arm.
I twisted my arm so as to gain a view of the part in question, and was utterly amazed to find the very mark described by the officer.
"I never saw it before," I stammered, "but it will do you no little good," said the officer; "first you deny your name, and next the existence of a mark, which it is impossible you should have borne upon your person without knowing it. It so happens that it is the very mark by which we are instructed to identify Rollickson, the famous American bank robber for whose arrival we have been for some time watching. It further happens that your appearance tallies with the description in other respects."
"All this is inexplicable," I said, helplessly.
"Except on the theory that we've got the right man," the other one answered.
I was a total stranger, without a friend on whom to call for assistance. If I could only find Rollickson! He—his quick wit might aid me. Rollickson! A thought flashed upon me, and I had seen him in private conference with the one who had arrested me. I remembered too that after waking from the sleep into which I had been cast by the drug which he had relieved me from sea-sickness, my arm had felt stiff and sore for several days. Might not Rollickson be the real Roach, and might he not have taken advantage of my stupor to place upon me a mark similar to that borne by himself, and had he not on landing pointed me out to the detectives as the object of their search, for the purpose of averting attention from himself? To that conclusion my mind came by one of those sudden intuitions which at times instantaneously produce deeper degrees of reasoning.
Just then a cab passed the window and in it I saw Rollickson himself.
"Stop that man!" I exclaimed, starting up and pointing him out.
The explanation astonished those present.

"Quick! Quick!" I cried "for heaven's sake!"
Impelled by my earnestness, a couple of policemen darted into the street. The cabman stopped, and the driver turned to look at me. Rollickson was escorted into the room in which I was a prisoner. He turned pale at sight of me.
"Strip him!" I exclaimed eagerly.
He drew back as an officer approached, and it was only after a struggle, and by main force, that he was compelled to submit to an inspection, which revealed a mark the exact counterpart of that found upon myself.
Here I had finished the narrative of my acquaintance with Rollickson, and the circumstances under which it began, an American detective entered the office and fully identified my late friend as the criminal for whom I had been so singularly mistaken. I was asked that when the blonde wig and whiskers were removed, with which he had disguised himself, the likeness between Rollickson and myself was quite marked.
I was released from custody, and the real Roach detained in my stead. The steamer carried him back to America to stand trial for numerous burglaries. And the young lady, it is to be hoped, was cured of the romance of falling in love with strangers at first sight.
Historical Recollections Preserved.
In the matter of commemorating the virtuous deeds and acts of our ancestors, no section of the Union can begin to vie with New England. They embrace them in poetry and recount them in flowery prose. They everywhere erect monuments to point out the place and recall the time that particular incidents of a glorious nature occurred. Thus, although the settlement of the Puritans was the third in the United States in point of date, it has come to be regarded in the public mind as the first that occurred. While every-where knows and remembers the 23rd of December almost as well as Christmas, how few can tell the time of the year when a white settlement was made at Jamestown, Virginia, or another in New York, at the Hudson river, both occupied long before the settlement of Massachusetts, and the founding of New York as important as that of Boston, or Virginia as Massachusetts? Ought they not, as historical events, be equally well known and celebrated? But the Virginians and New Yorkers have been careless and neglectful in this respect. They have not paid the tribute to their ancestors that they deserved. While a splendid shaft pierces the clouds upon the spot where a few hundred New England militia repulsed the British, at Bunker's Hill, there is nothing to mark the spot of our ancestors' occurrence that closed the Revolution, in Virginia, and secured the independence of this country. The grand military event of Yorktown, where Cornwallis, with a large British army, surrendered to the combined American and French forces of Washington and Rochambeau, has nothing to distinguish it as consecrated ground.
The sufferings of the first settlers at Jamestown were greater—the incidents connected with them more striking and romantic—than those of any other settlement in this country. It is a pity that no monument has been erected at Plymouth; but they have no celebration to recall them. The heroes of the former slept in their forgotten graves, while those of the latter have become immortalized in the parthenon of history. Daniel Webster, with his powerful pen, his grand and sonorous language, took a leading part in placing before the public mind the annals of our country, as the Puritans desired to recall them. The rock of Plymouth was little celebrated until the imposing figure of this illustrious orator appeared on its two hundredth anniversary, before a Massachusetts audience, and by the power of his imagination, made it stand out as the great pedestal upon which all our history had been built and all its institutions founded.
Again five years later, Mr. Webster stood, on the fiftieth anniversary of the battle of Bunker Hill, to rehearse its story and make it classical forever to the American people. For a quarter of a century his great oratory was employed in eulogies of the Puritans and their descendants, until their deeds became as familiar as household words to the country.
After him came a crowd of others, like Edward Everett, who took up the strain and repeated it with greater exaggeration at every point. New England has been wise in this: She has made the great events of her history useful in establishing a powerful mental influence over the whole country. New York and Pennsylvania have commemorated their deeds in physical grandeur and importance far above the little New England States, but the latter, owing to their industry in looking after their annals, have taken political precedence of them. They have been as careless as Massachusetts in their neglect of their history. They have had no word-painters like Daniel Webster to put them upon the historical canvas, or array them in the brilliant colors of rhetoric. Pennsylvania wears the plumed Quaker of historical simplicity, and the New York Knickerbocker has no pains to dress up the exciting story of Hendrick Hudson for anniversary occasions.
The land of the Cavaliers, good old Virginia, has also slumbered quietly on, without working the immense mines of historical treasures that are contained in her land. Thus, what there is of American history, our New England friends have taken possession of, and proceed to glorify themselves in it. From Blossie's Historical and Literary Miscellany.
A Game of Draw in which the Lover Won.
A lawyer is a lawyer the world over. Yesterday two laymen invited a lawyer to participate in a little game called "draw." The attorney didn't understand the game, but he took a hand and trusted to luck. The stakes were to be the handsome duels, and the attorney instantly planked down a $35 order, while the others each laid down a $12 due bill—the latter sum being the amount each was to put in the "pot." The game proceeded, the lawyer laid down his cards as it came his turn to play, and at length he was declared loser. He didn't have time to place a second game; so he took in change for his $35 due bill of the $12 orders, and was to call for the rest at another time. After he had gone the winner took up the $35 order and on examining it found that $33 95 of the amount had been paid and was endorsed on the back by losing the lawyer had won just $10 95.
