would be evidence of the existence of a degrading superstition. It renresents green devils with red tongues, and red devils with green tongues, pounding people in mortars, boiling them in oil, and frying them apon gridirons. In one corner an assistant devil is engaged in tying the legs and arms of men together, and another, who stands by with a plumb line and crayon, marks a black line down the middle of their backs for the guidance of a third, who saws them deliberately in half. As is seen, however, by the attitude of the spectators, the representation is regarded by the Japanese as a mere joke .-
