When I sit in twilight's silence, When the stars have all grown still

I dream of the green old mendows, And the old home on the hill. And I see the reses blooming All about its doorways low, And my heart gives gladdest greating. To the friends of long ago.

There I see my mother sitting With Time's snowflakes in her hair, And she smiles above her knitting, And her face is saintly fair. And I see my father reading

From the Bible on his knee, And again I hear him praying, As, of old be prayed for my, Oh, the dear, remembered faces

The Tyranny of Lincoln and Grant

Reading the speeches, ornute and grandiloquent, of the Southern gentlemen who have welcomed the President, one would gain the impression that vindictive and cruel despots had ruled the country for the last fifteen years. That Lincoln, sympathetic and large-hearted, was a Casar. That Grant, unsgnanimous and gencrous-the man who spared the pride of Lee and his officers, and softened the chagrin of their defeat by the nobility and delicacy with which he received their sorrender-was a bloodthirsty tyrant, who ground WHOLE NO. 1374. down a poor, unhappy people to the isst verge of possible endurance.
