J. H. Zimmerman,

We would must respectfully announce to a friends and the public generally, in the town a vicinity of Somerset, that we have opened of NewStore on AND DEALER. Wholesale and Retail,

SAUSAGE, Pudding, Bolog-Rendering. CORN-MEAL,

THE RIME OF THE STOVE MAN. It is the man of Summer street, Most woe-begone to sec. He dedged the friends whom he may meet,

Loud laughs his friends, "Ha, ha, ho, ho,"

Withhold thy chaff!" the victim cried,

The house was clean, the sun was bright

"Bring up the stove," the good wife cried, "Til brook me no delay."

The rusty stove from the shed I brought, The pipe and the elbow, too.

"The soot was here, the soot was there,

And flakes of rust on the carpet stood

Down dropped the pipe, the elbew feil.

The good wife scolded free, And the misfit joints they wrought a spell,

And eke they cry, "I say!"

Cheerily dawned the day,

"In wild unrest I beat my breast,

The soot was all around,

Like hear frost on the ground.

That raised old Cain with me,

"About, about, and in and out,

And much unseemly laugh.

Buth ends of every joint of pipe

Was bigger than the other

The joints shoved and cramed ;

With many a wail and many a shout,

I pounded them in. I pried them out.

"They rasped my knuckles to the bone,

They pinched my grimmy skin, They bled and blistered all they touched,

"Go way, go way, you awkward man."

"But I turned and watched with silent gaz-For wrath had made me dumb,

And hear, oh man and brother,

But I could not drive them in.

2 dropped the elbow joint and ran, As mad as mad could be.

And saw the wife of my bosom raise

Blood blisters on her thumb.

"I saw her sink on the sooty floor

In agony and pain, I heard her wall, 'Oh, never more,

Right quick I seized the manufed pine.

And I seek the man who maketh stoves,

Will I marry a man again!"

And the elbow, battered free ;

Will I be found so green, However may how! the winter blast,

To fool with a store, I ween."

To fix my stove for me. "Oh never again while life may last,

The good wife spake to me,

But I could not but choose but do;

Estsoons their chaff held they.

Who loudly laughed at he. For under his arm he bears a pipe, That eke belongs to the stove, And the elbow he graspe in his grimy hand, To the pipe it must be rove.
