Shultz taught the first school in this house. The German language was almost exclusively taught in the early schools, though Shultz taught both English and German. The common school system was not accepted until 1861, and then only through the most persistent efforts of such men as Joseph Lehman and Peter Berkey. There were four school-houses in the district at that time, while now there are ten. Some of these, however, are very small and poorly furnished but, as the school directors are active men, and have already built several new houses, we believe that further improvements will be made.
