OUR LONDON LETTER. London, September, 23 1878. From Paris to London is not more than nine or ten hours, (they estimate distance by time in Europe,) but that gives no idea of the immense changes in scenery, life and manners involved in the transition from one city to the other. Paris is clean, whitewalled, ever wearing an air of holiday and refinement. In Paris the humbler classes are cheerful, happy, healthy looking, and cheaply but neatly attired; her dandies are exquisite and diabolically gay, and her ladies, what more need said of them than that they dictate fashion to the female world, and are at the bottom of hard times.
