sents herself in gala dress to receive General Grant; with reason she admires in him the soldier of undismay. able faith, the good citizen who has not permitted the disintegration of his native land, the emancipator who with a firm hand, has shivered into pieces the ignominous chain of slavery.

After his victories, General Grant was raised to the dignity of the supreme magistry of his country, and after divesting himself of the public power with which his grateful fellowcitizens had entrusted him, he has soughs, in lengthened travels, matters of study and mental expansions: after from under the cover, as they had to where outstreched shores, lofty mounremembrances of our land. But he will also carry with him others; he will take with him those
