Don't Interrupt a Statesman.

When a statesman is at work preparing an impromptu speech he doesn't like to be disturbed, but the other day an orator who lives in the rural districts had a hard time of it. He had just sat down to write an oration, when his wife came in and told him the dogs were baying, roaring up the front yard. Of course a statesman couldn't go out and shut them up, so he said:

"Well, when the hired man comes in tell him to take care of them."

His wife turned out into the yard and as he picked up his pen his daughter looked in at another door and said: "Papa, the dogs are in the front yard."

"Yes, I know it," said he, "never mind," and she left.

The clock came in and said: "Mister, the boys are out and raising the mischief."

He was tired of hearing this news, and wanted to go on with his speech, and he replied:

"Don't you mind the boys, get on with your oration, and the boys will be all right."

"These dogs are out in the yard, and they look lively!"

"This quite enough, papa, and he cried."

"What the devil can I do with those dogs?"

"Shut 'em up!"

"Woman, if you think I'm going to stop writing an appeal for honest government, to go and chase dogs, you're mistaken. Leave me."

And he went on writing, and the dogs were all right.

Once more the tormented statesman turned to his speech and wrote three words, when his son burst in and cried:

"Oh, dad, the dogs is loose!"

"This was too much. The oration was all right, but the dogs were out of their collars, and he was obliged to stop writing, and he went out and chased the dogs, and he was all right."

"Sir, I didn't come here to be insulted."

"Get out," and the neighbor retired in a huff, and he went on writing, and the dogs were all right.

The statesman discovered that he hadn't time to commit the piece to memory, and he went on writing, and he was all right.

And after he had announced that the country was in danger because he wasn't going to chase dogs, and that his mother-in-law was a witch, and that "the cause of liberty demands a government of dogs," the crowd began to hiss and cry out, and he was obliged to stop writing, and he went on writing, and he was all right.
