

It was but the wild wailing... It was but the wild wailing...

THE COUNTRY DOCTOR

The indelicately colored leaves of the October morning were drifting down on the walk...

"No," cried the doctor, "surely my senses can't be playing me false! It is Frank Dulany! And what in the name of all the heathen gods has brought you here?"

"I'm coming to that," said Kirke. "I have a dozen pretty girls, at the very least, but only one country doctor. Why should she trouble herself about me, if she is, as you say, such a peerless beauty?"

"Because," Kirke laughingly answered, "she is a merciless beauty—a slaughterer of human hearts—in fine, a first-class coquette."

"And you think I shall become one of her victims?" said Doctor Dulany.

"Think?" echoed Kirke. "I don't think at all—I'm quite sure of it! But I'm only a poor old country doctor. Why should she trouble herself about me, if she is, as you say, such a peerless beauty?"

"But he's rather handsome," she unwillingly admitted to herself. "Miss Granger put on her prettiest dresses and decked her hair with the sweetest flowers of her aunt's little conservatory."

"The young doctor who has taken old Holden's practice," said Miss Granger, a little disdainfully. "He is to be at Miss Mix's on Monday. Very well—I shall soon see him."

"Geraldine Granger was a tall, imperious beauty, with dark, long-lashed eyes, a complexion like cream-and-roses, and a soft, languid voice, and at Miss Mix's social gathering that night, she looked so lovely as a dream of Carissima. But, to her infinite dismay and amazement, Dr. Dulany took no more notice of her than he did of old Mrs. Percy, who were a wig and blue spectacles. He was coolly polite—that was all; and Miss Granger did not know what to make of him."

"But he's rather handsome," she unwillingly admitted to herself. "Miss Granger put on her prettiest dresses and decked her hair with the sweetest flowers of her aunt's little conservatory."

The Slim Teacher. "Mister, no doubt you have all the learnin' that's required in a school learin', but it wants more than learin' to make a man able to teach school."
